Sufficiency of petition

(1) Allegations of petition in interstate carrier's action against surety on consignee's bond to recover amount of judgment paid to consignor "order notify" consignee was not demurrable on ground that they showed a rescission of the delivery made under contract between carrier and consignee.—Draper v. Georgia, F. & A. Ry. Co, 95 S E. 16, 21 Ga App 707, error dismissed 39 S. Ct. 132, 248 U S. 539, 63 L Ed. 410

(2) Petition on bond given to protect railroad delivering goods without bill of lading was sufficient without alleging bill of lading was produced, and that railroad thereby suffered damages.—Latimer v. Texas & N O. R Co, Tex Civ.App., 56 S.W 2d 933, error refused.

Directed verdict for carrier

In interstate carrier's action against surety on consignee's bond to recover amount of judgment paid to consignor "order notify" consignee, where there was no evidence that an unlawful preference had been extended to consignee or surety by contract as to delivery, a directed verdict for carrier was not error.—Draper v. Georgia F. & A Ry Co, 95 S.E. 16, 21 Ga App. 707, error dismissed 39 S.Ct. 132, 248 U S. 539, 63 L Ed. 410

Damages

One receiving a shipment of automobiles, without delivering bill of lading covering same, who gave bond to indemnify carrier against possible damage, was liable to carrier for depreciation in value of one car which he allowed to be used pursuant to supposed sale, when carrier demanded redelivery of same—Chicago, St P, M & O. "There is no authority in law or reason for the doctrine . . . that a common carrier who receives goods consigned to the order of the shipper, with instructions to notify a certain party at the destination, may deliver the goods to the party so notified, on an indemnity bond from the latter to protect the carrier, and compel the shipper to look to the party to whom the goods were delivered, as the purchaser, for the payment of the price or value of the goods."—Harwood-Barley Mfg. Co. v.

§ 173. Delivery to Wrong Person

The carrier ordinarily has a right of action for recovery of goods or their value, where they have been delivered to the wrong person through mistake, fraud, or otherwise, on refunding the freight charges paid by the receiver. A demand is not necessary before maintaining the action unless the misdelivery was due solely to the carrier's mistake, without fraud on the part of the receiver.

Where through mistake, fraud, or otherwise the carrier has been induced to deliver goods to a person not entitled thereto, and he refuses to return them, the carrier may maintain an action against him for the recovery of the goods[91] or for their value;[92] and it is no defense to an action of trover that a consignee receiving goods shipped under an order bill of lading, without surrender of the bill, believed that his receipt of the goods was justified because of the carrier's surrender of its actual possession.[93] Suit may be brought for the value of the goods without averment and proof of an assignment of his interest to the carrier by the person entitled to the goods,[94] and, a fortiori, may the carrier maintain such action where it has taken an assignment from such person of his interest.[95] Where the carrier brings an action for conversion, and also on an assignment of the shipper's right of action, plaintiff's right of recovery in the action for conversion is not affected by the fact that he did not have the assignment at the time of bringing the action, nor have title to the goods at the time of

Defenses

In shipper's action on the bill of lading for value of goods delivered by carrier to one not entitled to receive them without surrendering bill of lading, carrier and warrantors on indemnity bond, who did not object to being called on to defend the action, could not inject into suit as defense to the main action the complaints of purchaser of goods against shipper.—Harwood-Barley Mfg. Delivery without surrender of bill of lading

(1) Where a bill of lading required its surrender before delivery of the property, the delivering carrier, although the freight and demurrage charges had been paid, had such right of possession as bailee or agent as would support an action of trover against one obtaining possession without surrendering the bill.—New York Cent. R. Co. v. Freedman, 133 N.E. 101, 240 Mass. 200.

(2) If a consignee of goods knew that he was not entitled to possession without surrendering the bill of lading and that the carrier could not deliver the goods without a breach of its obligation to the shipper, and took possession knowing that the delivery was unauthorized and would not have been made except for an innocent mistake of fact, a verdict against him for conversion was justified.—New York Cent. R. Co. v. Freedman, supra.

Estoppel

(1) In determining whether carrier, in delivering an interstate shipment without requiring surrender of order bill of lading, was estopped to maintain an action against consignee for value of goods, court was required, not only to consider bill of lading as evidence of contract, but carrier's tariffs and orders of interstate commerce commission.—Norfolk Southern R. Co. v. Armfield, 127 S.E. 557, 189 N.C. 581.

(2) If carrier's agent released shipment under order bill of lading without demand thereof, neither title nor right of possession to shipment vested in consignee, and unlawful delivery thereof did not estop carrier to maintain an action against consignee for value of shipment, whether asserting its possessory right as bailee, or its title to property under an assignment of bill of lading.—Norfolk Southern R. Co. v. Armfield, supra.

Recoupment; instructions

In a carrier's action on an assignment of the shipper's claim for the purchase price against the consignee who had obtained possession without surrendering the bill of lading, evidence that lamps were broken when received did not require an abstract instruction as to defendant's right to recoupment, where the nature of the breakage or whether it diminished the value of the lamps was not shown.—New York Cent. Transfer of bill of lading

If carrier's agent delivered shipment, made under order bill of lading, without demanding bill of lading, carrier, after taking transfer thereof from shipper, had cause of action in contract against consignee, and without bill of lading had cause of action against consignee for conversion.—Norfolk Southern R. Co. v. Armfield, 127 S.E. 557, 189 N.C. 581.

its conversion.[96] If the carrier after delivery to the wrong person on demand pays the consignee their full value, it may recover from such person the money so paid as paid to his use,[97] provided the delivery was by mistake,[98] and provided there are no other circumstances estopping the carrier.[99] So, where a carrier has delivered goods shipped under an "order notify" bill of lading to the person to be notified, without surrender of the bill or payment of the draft attached thereto, the carrier is entitled, after making good to the shipper, to recover from the person to be notified,[1] or from one who purchased the goods from him with notice of the outstanding bill,[2] the amount so paid; and the notify consignee, if he desires to escape payment on the ground that the shipment was too late, must prove that the delay was caused by the shipper or carrier.[3] The carrier may even recover against the innocent holder of a false bill of lading to whom it has delivered the property. This is on the principle that, where one of two innocent parties must suffer, that one by whose act the loss was occasioned must bear it.[4] So a carrier who delivers goods on a forged order can recover their value after fully accounting to the consignee from warehousemen to whom they were delivered by the fraudulent recipient for a valuable consideration, and by whom they were sold without knowledge of the fraud to other parties, the maxim of caveat emptor being applicable to such sale.[5] On the other hand, it has been held that a carrier who has negligently delivered goods to a vendee of the shipper without collecting the purchase money as should have been done, or without requiring the production of the bill of lading, cannot recover them from a bona fide purchaser of the vendee.[6] Where a statute requires actions to be prosecuted by the real party in interest, a private carrier who fails to retain possession of the goods until payment of the price, but delivers them unconditionally, cannot, as agent to collect, maintain an action in his own name to recover possession of the goods and so remedy his own default.[7] A carrier negligently delivering the goods to the wrong person, who accepts and uses them, and subsequently pays the consignor the full purchase price, cannot maintain trover against the person so receiving the goods.[8] It has been held that, notwithstanding the courts of one state have compelled the carrier to pay the consignor the value of goods on the ground that they had been misdeliv-

Allegation necessary

Allegation and proof of carrier, in action against one to whom it had misdelivered goods, did not warrant recovery, in absence of showing of mistake or fraud, or authority by shipper to bring suit.—Lancaster v. Boston Store, Tex.Civ.App., 282 S.W. 605.

What is not a delivery by mistake

Defendant purchased a car of cement, and the car was billed to the consignor with directions to notify defendant of its arrival. On its arrival plaintiff notified defendant, the notice stating that a bill of lading or a written order must accompany the notice to obtain the goods. The car was placed on a siding where defendant had received previous cars, and it appeared that plaintiff's agent had received bills of lading on some of the previous shipments before delivering the cars to the siding, and in other cases had not. Defendant paid the freight on the car and unloaded it, and subsequently the consignor to whom the car was billed demanded it from plaintiff who being unable to deliver the contents paid the value thereof and brought action against defendant for conversion of the cement. It was held that, plaintiff having intentionally delivered the car to defendant who received it in good faith and paid the freight thereon and paid for the cement to the person from whom he purchased, there was not a delivery by mistake in the usual acceptance of that term, and plaintiff could not recover.—Long Island R. Co. v. Structural Concrete Co., 110 N.Y.S. 379, 59 Misc. 167.

99. Innocent brokers

Where defendant grain brokers and plaintiff carrier unintentionally and innocently converted grain shipped, and where the carrier paid the owners of the grain therefor and took from them an assignment of the grain and cause of action and instituted this suit, defendants could set up the defense that, as between them and the carrier, it could not purchase and assert the claim of the shippers, since it committed the first act in the conversion of the grain, out of which grew the connection of defendants with the transaction.—Greer v. Equity Co-operative Exchange, 163 N.W. 527, 137 Minn. 300, L.R.A.1917F, 440.

Evidence admissible

In suit for conversion of car of wheat, brought by assignee of shipper, evidence that plaintiff had no interest in assignment of cause of action, but that railroad had paid shipper, and taken assignment for its own benefit, and brought action thereon, was admissible.—Greer v. Equity Co-operative Exchange, 163 N.W. 527, 137 Minn. 300, L.R.A.1917F 440.

ered, the carrier will not be permitted to recover from the person to whom the goods were delivered the value of the goods in the courts of another state which take the view that there was no misdelivery.[9] The receivers of goods delivered to them by mistake are entitled to prompt notice from the carrier whether it will elect to take the value of the goods or take back such goods, and on failure of the carrier to make its election within a reasonable time, the right of election passes to the receivers of the goods; and if, before discovering the mistake, they had used them in their business, they could discharge their obligations to the carrier by tendering an equal quantity of goods of the same grade.[10]

Demand and offer to refund charges paid. A demand is not a necessary condition precedent to an action against the receiver of the goods who knew that delivery to him was unauthorized;[11] but, where the misdelivery was due solely to the carrier's mistake, without fraud on the part of the receiver, it must demand possession of the goods before maintaining an action in detinue or trover.[12] To entitle the carrier to maintain an action to recover the property or its value it must refund or offer to refund the amount paid to it as freight charges,[13] and such charges may be allowed as a set-off against the carrier's claim;[14] but the refunding of the charges as a condition of maintaining the action may be waived.[15]

Delivery to another carrier
A railroad, which undertook to carry cotton and to deliver it to the shipper at destination, but did not perform the contract, claiming that it delivered the shipper's cotton to another railroad at destination, is liable to the shipper for the whole loss, for failure to deliver to him.—Barwick v. Under federal Bills of Lading Act
(1) A carrier is liable, where it delivers goods to one who is not lawfully entitled to the possession of them, to any one having a right of property or possession in the goods if it delivers the property otherwise than as authorized under or negligence of the shipper or person entitled to the goods induced the misdelivery, as stated in subdivision c (3) infra of this section. Such wrongful delivery constitutes a conversion,[17] rendering it the provisions of the law or where it delivers to one authorized under the law after it has been requested by some person having a right of property not to make such delivery or had information at the time of the delivery that it was to a person not entitled to the possession —Teller & Co. v. American Railway Express Co., 78 Pa Super. 300.

(2) A carrier delivering to consignee in straight bill, after receipt of instructions from one having right of property or possession not to deliver to such consignee, is liable to person so instructing.

Test of liability for negligent misdelivery

When freight has been received by a carrier for shipment, it becomes the property of the consignee or holder of the bill of lading, and its value to him is the test of the liability of the railroad company for negligence in case of misdelivery, and, although the bill of lading be not regarded technically as a stipulation pour autrui, the carrier is bound not to cause loss to the consignee by its negligence —C. H. Rice & Sons v. Payne, 92 So. 395, 151 La. 949.

Unpaid seller

Carrier was not liable to seller loading car, for breach of contract to withhold delivery, where buyer, who had not made payment, ordered car and gave shipping instructions. Under such circumstances, the carrier incurred no liability in tort to seller, although station agent attempted to detain car pending payment.—Wirch v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Delivery to one owning only half interest Railroad which delivered entire carload of pipe to one of joint adventurers having half interest therein, contrary to shipper's instructions to deliver only half of shipment to such joint adventurer, held liable, together with joint adventurer, to his coadventurer for conversion —Shefts Supply v. Fischer, 41 P.2d 902, 171 Okl. 72.

Delivery to compress company instead of to consignee

Where a carrier failed to deliver cotton to the consignee, but turned it over to a compress company, retaining such company's ticket, it was liable for loss of the cotton by fire while it was held by the compress company.

Crossing shipments of cattle by mistake

Where railroad company crossed deceased shipper's shipment of cattle with that of another shipper through mistake, the railroad company was liable to the damaged shipper for conversion of the cattle.—Metcalf v Payne, 106 So. 496, 214 Ala. 81.

Acts not constituting conversion

(1) Words "compress at Cameron," typewritten below signature of railroad's agent to bill of lading, were a part of contract for shipment of cotton to Cameron, so that railroad's placing thereof at such compress on arrival, pursuant to general custom, was not conversion, rendering it liable for destruction of cotton by fire before presentation of bill of lading by plaintiff —Gulf, C. & S F. Ry Co. v. Buckholts State Bank, Tex. Com App, 270 S W. 1008, reversing, Civ.App., 258 S W. 491

(2) Where goods sold were consigned to the buyer under bill of lading running to the order of the seller, notify the buyer, and the railroad notified the buyer of arrival, and the buyer telegraphed the seller to wire the railroad to allow examiimmediately liable, regardless of a subsequent destruction of the goods by act of God,[18] and irrespective of its good faith in making the delivery. No question of care arises, for in such case the carrier acts at its peril and is liable regardless of negligence.[19] Thus a carrier is liable for conversion where it delivers the goods to the consignee with notice that he is not entitled thereto,[20] or, delivers to one not the consignee, on the order of the person in whose care the goods were addressed, but who had no authority to give such order,[21] or changes a consignment billed to the order of the shipper to a straight consignment to the person to be notified,[22] or makes delivery to one not entitled thereto without surrender of the bill of lading.[23] So, where the shipment is made under an "order" or "order notify" bill of lading, a delivery without requiring the surrender of the bill renders the carrier liable to the person entitled to the goods for the value thereof,[24] if due to the failure to take up the nation of the car, the seller wiring the railroad "Allow examination only," but the customer for whose benefit examination was asked did not take the goods, so that the buyer arranged with a warehouse company for unloading, and requested the railroad to deliver the goods to the warehouse company, which was done by the railroad with specific direction not to deliver without surrender of the original bill of lading, properly indorsed, the goods being received by the warehouse company to the account of the order of the seller, and remaining in storage until destroyed by fire, the railroad, in such delivery to the warehouse company, did not so transfer control of the goods to the buyer as to amount to a conversion giving the seller a right of action.—Booth v. New York Cent. R. Co., 112 A. 894, 95 Vt. 9.

Under federal Bills of Lading Act

(1) A carrier which has issued an order bill of lading is liable to holder thereof for loss which may be sustained as result of delivery of goods represented by bill of lading to any person without production of order bill of lading.—Morse-Hubbard Co. v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 3 N.E. 2d 93, 286 Ill.App. 163.

(2) Carrier over which two carloads of potatoes were shipped under order bills of lading with drafts attached and its lessee which surrendered one carload of potatoes without presentation of order bill of lading on presentation of paid draft and second carload of potatoes on surrender of order bill of lading without payment of draft was liable to shipper for loss sustained in transaction as against contention that railroads were not liable, since car which had not been paid for was not that which was delivered without surrender of bill of lading.—Morse-Hubbard Co. v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., supra.

Liability to bona fide purchaser of bill of lading

The delivery of goods shipped on order bills of lading within the meaning of U.S.Comp.St. §§ 8604aaa, 8604b, 49 U.S.C.A. §§ 81, 83, to a person who was not a holder of the bills of lading was wrongful without reference to an order for such delivery by the consignee, and entitled a purchaser of the bills of lading for value and in good faith to judgment against the carrier, under U.S.Comp.St. §§ 8604ee, 8604f, 8604p, 49 U.S.C.A. §§ 90, 91, 111, if the claim was presented in time.—Davis v. First Nat. Bank of Longview, Tex.Civ.App., 245 S.W. 1009.

Holder of bill of lading with draft attached

A carrier wrongfully delivered goods shipped under an order bill of lading without requiring its surrender as against a bank which held the bill of lading attached to a draft purchased by it, although merely as collateral for payment of the draft.—National Bank of the Republic v. Hines, 192 P. 899, 112 Wash. 352.

bill.[25] A delivery under such circumstances amounts to a conversion.[26] It has been held, however, that delivery to a compress company, as authorized by bill of lading, was not a conversion rendering the carrier liable for the loss of the goods by fire before presentation of the bill.[27] The carrier is not liable for misdelivery merely because it fails to require the surrender of an order bill of lading,[28] or of a straight bill of lading not marked "nonnegotiable,"[29] unless the carrier's failure to take up the bill was the proximate cause of the loss suffered by the shipper or the innocent holder of the bill. In general, a recovery cannot be had for wrongful delivery without the surrender of the bill of lading,

Remedies of shipper

Where railroad wrongfully delivered goods to purchasers from quasi consignee under shipper's order notify shipment, he having failed to pay drafts and secure bill of lading, shipper had right of action against: First, Purchasers; second, quasi consignee; or third, railroad.—Kewanee Private Utilities Co. v. Cause of loss

(1) Where delivery is made to a person who has the bill, or who has authority from the holder of the bill, and the cause of the shipper's loss is not the failure to require surrender of the bill, but the improper acquisition of it by the deliveree, or his improper subsequent conduct, the mere failure to require presentation and surrender of the bill will not make the delivery a conversion.—Pere Marquette R. Co. v. J. F. French & Co., 41 S.Ct. 195, 254 U.S. 538, 65 L.Ed. 391, reversing J. F. French & Co. v. Pere Marquette Ry. Co., 171 N.W. 491, 204 Mich. 578.

(2) Where sellers of potatoes attached the bill of lading to a draft and sold it to a bank, which sent it to another bank for collection of the draft, and such bank delivered the bill of lading without payment of the draft, and the buyers obtained possession without surrendering the bill, and afterwards rejected the potatoes and caused the bill of lading to be returned, the delivery by the carrier without requiring surrender of the bill of lading was not the cause of the shipper's loss, and did not constitute a conversion.—Pere Marquette R. Co. v. J. F. French & Co. supra.

(3) In such case the sellers were under no duty to take back the draft and bill of lading from the bank to which they sold them, as it was the tortious act of such bank's agent that occasioned the damage, and, having assumed the loss in so doing, the sellers could not hold the carrier for technical failure to take up the bill of lading.—Pere Marquette R. Co. v. J. F. French & Co., supra.

(4) Railroad's delivery of wheat to one named as consignor, consignee, and party to be notified, without taking up bills of lading as required by Penal L. § 365, was not the proximate cause of loss to bank which accepted bills of lading as security for a loan to consignor after consignor had wrongfully changed dates thereon, where the original dates antedated the date when they were delivered to the bank as security by so long a period that the bank would have been put on inquiry concerning the situation if dates had not been changed, since the intervening act of the consignor could not have been reasonably anticipated.—Saugerties Bank v. Delaware & Hudson Co., 141 N.E. 904, 236 N.Y. 425, affirming 198 N.Y.S. 722, 204 App.Div. 211, and reargument denied 142 N.E. 331, 236 N.Y. 675.

where no damages resulted from the misdelivery,[30] as where the consignors have received payment for the goods shipped.[31] Where an interstate shipment was made under an order bill of lading which impliedly authorized inspection, and the buyer inspected the goods without presenting the bill, but refused to accept the goods, whereupon they were sold by the shipper, there was no conversion by the carrier, and it was not liable under the federal statute where the inspection did not result in loss, damage, or injury to the goods.[32] Where consignees paid a draft attached to the bill of lading and received the bill, but the carrier, at the shipper's request, and without notice to the consignee, or surrender of the bill of lading, substituted the name of the shipper as consignee and diverted the shipment to another place, the carrier was liable to the original consignee for the loss resulting to him from the change in shipment.[33] Matters relieving the carrier from liability for misdelivery, including the negligence of the shipper, and ratification or waiver of the misdelivery, are discussed in subdivision c infra of this section.

b. Mistake or Fraud

(1) General rule
(2) Extent and limits of rule

(1) General Rule

Delivery to the wrong person is not excused even though due to mistake or fraud.

It is the general rule that a carrier cannot relieve itself from liability for delivery to a person not entitled to the goods, because such delivery was due to mistake or to the fraud of the person receiving the goods,[34] as where delivery is made on a forged order.[35] The question is not one of due care, for the carrier, like any other bailee, acts at its peril in making delivery, as stated supra § 174 a. The law exacts of the carrier absolute certainty that the person to whom delivery is made is rightfully entitled to the goods and places on it the entire risk of mistake.[36] The fact that goods are consigned to a named person at a named street and number, for the purpose of aiding the carrier in identifying the consignee, does not justify the carrier in delivering the goods to a third person at that address.[37]

(2) Extent and Limits of Rule

A carrier is liable for loss caused by delivery to one not the actual consignee, although the delivery was due to the fraud of the person receiving the goods, and even though the consignee refused to receive them; but the carrier is not liable where, in good faith, it delivers to the person to whom the goods were actually sent, although such person fraudulently induced the consignor to believe he was sending the goods to another person, but even then the carrier is liable if the successful perpetration of the fraud was due to its negligence.

Where one not the actual consignee, by means of any fraudulent device, procures a delivery of the goods to himself, the carrier is liable to the consignor for the loss,[38] and in the application of this

Nature of mistake

(1) Where plaintiff, having two cars of peaches, sold one car to H, after having shown peaches in such car to H, and carrier issued two night orders so that holders could unload them for sale when the market opened, but delivered the wrong night order to plaintiff's driver and the error was not discovered until the car was unloaded, and H refused to take the other car, and as a result the peaches were not sold until they were overripe and loss resulted, the carrier was liable, since H was entitled to receive the car he had inspected and purchased, and the carrier could not claim that no damage resulted because the other peaches were available to H—Vogel v. St. Louis Merchants' Bridge Terminal Ry. Co, Mo.App, 16 S W 2d 624 rule it is immaterial that the actual consignee refuses to accept the goods,[39] since in these circumstances it is the duty of the carrier to warehouse the goods and hold them subject to the consignor's order, as stated infra § 179. The rule applies with full force and effect, although the consignee to whom the goods are billed is a fictitious person or firm in whose name the goods have been fraudulently ordered. Here also it is the duty of the carrier to warehouse the goods for the consignor.[40] Nevertheless it is very generally held that, where the carrier, acting in good faith and with due diligence, delivers goods to the person to whom they were actually sent, it is not liable for a misdelivery, although by false and fraudulent devices that person induced the consignor to believe that he was sending the goods to another person,[41] since the carrier, although strictly responsible for delivery to the proper person, is not an insurer against frauds on the shipper by the consignee,[42] but even on this state of facts, if the carrier in making delivery is guilty of negligence, except for which the fraud could not successfully have been perpetrated, it will be liable.[43] The fact that the delivery is the result of an innocent mistake on the part of another carrier from whom it receives the goods will not relieve the carrier from liability.[44] Where a bill of lading authorizes the delivery of goods to the consignee without its production, misdelivery by a connecting carrier, to the party named as consignee by the initial carrier without the production of the bill of lading does not avoid the liability of the initial carrier to the consignor.[45] Misdelivery on an unindorsed bill of lading which has been improperly obtained by the person presenting it renders the carrier liable.[46] Where the bill of lading fails to show who the consignee is, delivery without ascertaining from the shipper to whom delivery is to be made makes the carrier liable as for a conversion.[47]

c. Matters Excusing Misdelivery or Affecting Liability

(1) In general
(2) Negligence of shipper
(3) Ratification or waiver

(1) In General

A carrier will not be relieved from liability for misdelivery by a return or offer to return the goods, or by the fact that the freight charges were not paid, or that delivery was made in the customary manner, or that the goods were uncalled for. Delivery to the person entitled thereto relieves the carrier from liability for misdelivery.

The fact that the carrier was entitled to retain the goods until the freight was paid,[48] or that the Nature of fraud

Where plaintiff, on telephone orders from swindler styling himself as "William Evans, 4922 Fairmount avenue, Philadelphia," which name plaintiff found listed with satisfactory rating in credit agency reports, but without any address, made two shipments of butter to swindler at address given, which was store rented by swindler, the carrier was not liable to plaintiff for delivering butter to swindler at its Philadelphia terminal on delivery order on letter head of "William Evans, 4922 Fairmount avenue," nor in delivering second shipment to same person on following day without another delivery order.—Fox River Butter Co. v. Lightning Motor Line, 210 N.Y.S. 172, 125 Misc. 116.

shipper breached his contract to accompany the shipment or furnish attendants,[49] will not relieve the carrier from liability for delivery to the wrong person; nor will a carrier's liability for conversion by misdelivery be affected by a return or offer to return the goods,[50] or by tendering to the owner, several months after a misdelivery, a part of the goods;[51] and, where the goods were lost by misdelivery, the offer of the recipient to return equivalent goods to the consignor will not bar the consignor's right to recover from the carrier money compensation for the loss.[52] Where a carrier wrongfully diverted a shipment at the direction of the prospective buyer in whose care the shipment was made, the subsequent financial irresponsibility of the buyer will not relieve the carrier from liability, since the conversion took effect immediately upon the unwarranted diversion.[53] A rejected compromise proposition made to the consignee of goods by a person to whom they have wrongfully been delivered by the carrier for the purchase thereof and payment of a profit on the same does not relieve the carrier from liability for its breach of contract.[54] On the other hand, a carrier cannot be held liable for misdelivery where the goods are delivered to the true owner, or to one entitled to the possession thereof,[55] or are delivered in accordance with the shipper's directions;[56] and where the carrier makes delivery before obtaining the bill of lading, but subsequently rightfully obtains possession of the bill, it is not liable for conversion.[57] A shipper who, without right, used the proceeds of a draft drawn on his purchaser, for the purpose of satisfying a prior claim against the purchaser, could hold the carrier liable for conversion because it delivered to such purchaser the goods, of less value than the draft, without taking up the bill of lading.[58] Where the carrier delivers the goods to the true owner without a surrender of the order bill of lading, and the shipper, who retained the bill, was paid for the goods, the carrier is not liable to the shipper merely because it failed to get the bill before making delivery.[59]

Delivery according to custom. In accordance with the general rule, which will be discussed in the C.J.S. title Negligence § 16, also 45 C.J. p 708 note 39, that custom or usage will not justify an act which is negligent per se, the custom of a carrier to deliver goods to persons other than the consignee or to whom the consignee has authorized delivery to be made, will not relieve the carrier from liability for misdelivery;[60] so where the consignor ships goods to himself as consignee, a delivery of the goods to a third person in possession of the bill, without indorsement thereon, being unauthorized, as stated supra § 172 c (1), will render the carrier liable for misdelivery notwithstanding the custom of the particular carrier at that particular place to deliver the goods without such indorsement,[61] and, where production of the bill of lading is required before delivery, the custom or practice of the carrier to deliver without the production of the bill will not relieve it from liability for the wrongful delivery,[62] especially where such custom was not known to the shipper.[63]

Attendants for live stock

Where a carrier's agent knows that neither the plaintiff nor any agent of his is accompanying live stock being transported by it, its liability for delivery of the stock to the wrong person or for converting the stock to its own use is not qualified by contract provisions reciting that the shipper will care for the stock and furnish attendants and that if he does not, the carrier's acts with respect to the care of the stock will be considered done as the shipper's representative —Morrell v. Goods not called for. The carrier's duty to deliver to the right person is not affected by the fact that the goods are left uncalled for or are refused by the person entitled to them;[64] but delivery to the person whom the consignee designates as the one to whom delivery is to be made constitutes a complete bar to an action by the consignee for misdelivery, although the person to whom the goods are delivered refused to pay for them.[65] Where the loss of goods by fire after delivery at a compress was due to the failure to present the bill of lading for nearly a month after the arrival of the goods, the carrier was not liable for conversion.[66]

(2) Negligence of Shipper

Negligence of the shipper or person entitled to the goods relieves the carrier from liability if the misdelivery was caused thereby.

A carrier will be excused from liability for misdelivery where it was misled by the shipper[67] or consignee[68] as to the person to whom delivery should be made. Thus a carrier ordinarily is not liable for a misdelivery caused by the negligence of the shipper in improperly addressing the goods.[69] So, where the carrier accepted a box for delivery in accordance with shipping directions in a straight bill of lading, to which no objection was made by the shipper, giving an address different from that on the box, the carrier was not liable for misdelivery in the absence of fraud or any previous agreement.[70] The mere fact that an erroneous address is given will not exonerate the carrier, however, if it is not thereby misled into making delivery of the goods to a person wrongfully securing them.[71] The negligence of the shipper is no defense if, notwithstanding such negligence, the loss would not have occurred except for the carrier's negligence.[72] Where the person in charge of a shipment of live stock was the agent of the shipper only for the purpose of taking care of the stock in transit, his negligence did not excuse a misdelivery by the carrier which was bound to ascertain the extent of his authority.[73]

(3) Ratification or Waiver

A delivery to the wrong person may be waived or the right of action against the carrier therefor waived.

The owner or person entitled to the goods in the possession of a carrier may ratify a wrongful delivery thereof,[74] or waive its rights against the carrier therefor;[75] and, where such delivery is ratified with a full knowledge of the facts, the carrier is thereby exempted from further liability.[76] So a carrier who permits trial by a prospective purchaser of machinery shipped under an order bill of lading, without presentation of the bill of lading, is not liable to the shipper for conversion, where the taking of temporary possession for the purpose of trial was directed by the shipper's agent, and such trial was acquiesced in, and ratified by, the shipper;[77] but, in order to release a carrier from liability for wrongful delivery on the ground of ratification,[78] or waiver,[79] it must plainly appear that the ratification or waiver was intended, with full knowledge of all the material facts. What constitutes a ratification or waiver depends on the facts of each particular case[80] and may be shown by express words or implied from words, acts, or silence.[81] It has been held that a shipper ratifies a wrongful delivery by accepting from the person to whom delivery is made payment of the price of the goods, or part payment with a promise to pay the balance,[82] and that a ratification results even from a demand for payment of the price.[83] It has also been held that a shipper ratifies the wrongful act of the carrier in delivering bills of lading to the purchaser of goods shipped, by suing for the price, as represented by a draft given by the purchaser and prosecuting the suit to judgment with knowledge of the wrongful delivery of the bills;[84] and that a shipper's acceptance of the consignee's check, part of which it was directed to credit on the shipment, with full knowledge that delivery was made before draft for price was paid, ratifies the wrongful delivery.[85] On the other hand, it has been held that, where goods are delivered to the wrong person and sold, the acceptance of the proceeds thereof by the shipper does not ratify or waive the misdelivery,[86] but goes only in mitigation of damages, as appears infra § 184 c. So it has been held that acceptance of payment for a part of the goods delivered to the wrong person does not waive the wrongful delivery of the remainder;[87] that, where the shipper's recovery of a part of the goods or their value did not destroy the carrier's rights against the person to whom they were

(2) The fact that a bank had a draft indorsed and delivered to it, with bill of lading attached, presented for payment before or after the carrier's unauthorized delivery of the shipment, or whether with or without notice of said delivery, did not operate as a ratification thereof so as preclude the bank from maintaining action against the carrier for failure to deliver or in delivering without surrender of the bill of lading.—Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Dothan Nat. Bank, 91 So. 351, 206 Ala. 602.

(3) That shipper's agent took possession at original destination did not establish ratification of carrier's failure to divert shipments.—Vaccaro Bros. & Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 123 So. 355, 11 La.App. 348.

wrongfully delivered, such recovery does not bar the shipper's action against the carrier for misdelivery;[88] that a consignor who gave credit to the consignee did not ratify the carrier's misdelivery of the goods to a third person by receiving part payment of the price from such person;[89] and that the owner or person entitled to possession of the goods does not waive or ratify a wrongful delivery, by attempting to secure payment for, or the value of, the goods from the person to whom they were wrongfully delivered,[90] or by taking a check, subsequently dishonored.[91] The burden of showing ratification rests on the carrier.[92] If the facts relating to ratification are in dispute, or if reasonable minds might draw different conclusions from the facts, the question of ratification or waiver is for the jury.[93] If the facts are undisputed, however, and no other conclusion can reasonably be drawn than that an unqualified ratification was intended, the law imputes this intention to the ratifying party, who will not be heard to say that his intenion was otherwise,[94] and whether or not different conclusions can reasonably be drawn from the facts in evidence is a question of law.[95]

d. Actions Other than for Conversion

Assumpsit will lie against a carrier for misdelivery, and in actions based on breach of contract the usual rules of practice are applicable.

Assumpsit will lie against a carrier for delivery of goods to one not entitled thereto without the surrender of the bill of lading.[96] In an action for breach of contract because of delivery of the goods to one not entitled thereto, the general rules are applicable with respect to parties.[97] The action can be brought only by the shipper, since the contract of carriage was made with him,[98] although the consignee, when he is the owner of the goods, may sue for conversion, as appears infra § 183 d. The person wrongfully receiving the goods is not a proper party to the action for breach of contract.[99] The general rules are also applicable as to presumptions and burden of proof,[1] and the admissibility[2] and weight and sufficiency[3] of the evi-

Evidence sufficient

(1) To show delivery without indorsement of bill of lading and payment of draft attached.—Dyer v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., Mo.App., 186 S.W. 529.

(2) To warrant finding that loss from delivery without surrender of bills of lading sent, with drafts attached, to bank, was not due to dence. The value of the goods misdelivered is ordinarily the measure of damages;[4] and such value is the fair cash market value at the time and place the goods should have been delivered.[5] Under the Cummins amendment to the Interstate Commerce Act, providing for recovery of the "full actual loss," however, such loss may, but need not necessarily, be the market value of the property at destination;[6] and where the carrier delivers the property to a purchaser without requiring the surrender of the bill of lading, in consequence of which the shipper did not receive the price the purchaser was to pay him, the measure of damages is the amount he would have received had the carrier performed its contract, and not the market value of the property at destination.[7] In the absence of actual or constructive notice to a carrier that plaintiff relies on special circumstances additional to such as are the natural and probable result of wrongful delivery, the consequential damages are not recoverable.[8] A carrier negligently delivering a shipment of cattle consigned to a commission merchant for sale, to one of his competitors, was held liable to the consignee for the loss of his commission which he had virtually earned and would have received but for the carrier's negligence.[9] Procedure in actions for conversion for misdelivery is treated infra § 183, and the measure of damages for conversion is discussed infra § 184.

§ 175. Liability of Carrier as Warehouseman

Where a carrier's liability as such terminates and its liability as warehouseman begins, it is liable for negligently delivering the goods to the wrong person; but ordinarily it ceases to be liable as an insurer of proper delivery.

If after the carrier's liability as such has ceased and that of warehouseman has begun it negligently delivers the goods to the wrong person it is liable of course in damages for such loss,[10] in accordance with well settled rules relating to the duties and liabilities of warehouseman, considered in the C.J.S. title Warehousemen and Safe Depositaries § 49, also 67 C.J. p 524 et seq. Expressions are sometimes found which seem to imply that, although transportation is terminated and the goods are held by the carrier as warehouseman, its duty to deliver to the right person is the same as if its relation to the goods was still that of carrier, that its duty to deliver to the right person is absolute, and that delivery to one not entitled to the goods renders it liable as for a conversion;[11] and it has been held that bank's negligence in not applying in payment of such draft proceeds of other drafts deposited in bank by consignee on customers with attached invoices for same grain.—Nashville, C & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Tennessee-Oklahoma Grain Co., C C A.Tenn, 4 F.2d 756.

(3) To sustain finding that delivery to teamster was authorized by consignee.—Myers v. American Ry. Express Co., 137 N.E. 654, 243 Mass 390.

(4) To sustain finding that plaintiff bank to whom bill of lading was transferred did not authorize the shipper's agent to release the goods without the bill of lading, so that the carrier was liable to it for the ensuing loss.—First Nat. Bank v Grand Rapids & I. Ry. Co., 161 N.W 859, 195 Mich. 1.

Value of goods

Carrier's draft finding as to value of shipment misdelivered was held sufficient to support trial court's conclusion as to value.—Interstate Window Glass Co. v. New York, N. H & H R. Co., 133 A. 102, 104 Conn 342

4. Ohio.—Pittsburg, C, C. & St. L Ry. Co. v Guarantee Finance & Securities Co, 153 N.E 166, 21 Ohio App. 227.

Delivery without requiring payment of draft

The measure of damages for wrongful delivery of goods by the carrier to the consignee without requiring payment of the draft cannot exceed the value of the goods.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hartwell, 36 S.W. 183, 99 Ky. 436.

Jury question

In an action to determine the liability of a carrier for the wrongful delivery of two carloads of logs, and the liability of the recipient to the carrier for such logs, conflicting evidence as to the quality of the logs raises a question for the jury as to whether they were suitable for mine props, or were merely mill logs, or were suitable for either. The measure of such liability, whether the logs be considered mill logs, mine props, or as suitable for either, was their market value, and that lack of notice to the carrier of probable loss arising from special circumstances would not preclude the jury from considering their higher value as mill props.—Norfolk Southern R. Co. v. Houtz, 118 S.E. 850, 186 N.C. 46.

Carrier held not negligent

(1) Where carrier's practice, upon surrender of arrival notice and letter from consignee authorizing delivery, was to issue paid freight bill, enabling holder to obtain delivery, it was not negligent in not having person receiving the freight bill sign his name thereon at the time in order that delivery clerk might identify him by comparison of signatures.—Salomon Stern, Limited, of America v. Davis, D.C.N.Y., 292 F. 221.

the carrier will be liable even though the misdelivery is the result of an honest mistake on its part.[12] On the other hand, it has been held that, where the carrier's relation to the goods as carrier has terminated and that of voluntary bailee attached, its absolute duty to deliver to the right person has also terminated, and that it will be liable for a misdelivery only in case it has failed to exercise reasonable and proper care and caution.[13] The nature and extent of a carrier's duties and liabilities as warehouseman with reference to goods awaiting delivery are discussed supra §§ 152–158.

§ 176. Delivery at Wrong Place

A carrier is liable for damages caused by delivery of the goods at the wrong place. If the owner accepts the goods he releases the carrier from future liability, but not from liability for damages already sustained.

A common carrier having received goods for transportation to a designated point is liable as for a conversion if it carries the goods to a different point, thereby depriving the owner of his goods.[14] A carrier is not, however, liable for damages resulting from diversion of a shipment under the order of the shipper's agent acting within the scope of his authority,[15] nor is the carrier liable when delivery at the wrong destination was due to the mistake of the shipper in marking the goods.[16] If the owner accepts the goods notwithstanding they are delivered at the wrong place, he thereby releases the carrier from any future liability with reference to the goods, but he does not release the carrier from liability for damages already sustained[17] A carrier who negligently fails to divert a shipment as instructed by the shipper is liable for the loss.[18] So, where a shipper attempted to divert a shipment to a different destination and received a new bill of lading, but the carrier through a mistake for which it was responsible carried the goods to the original destination and delivered them to the consignee named in the first bill of lading, the carrier was guilty of a conversion.[19] A state court has jurisdiction of an action against a carrier to recover damages for breach of contract in failing to deliver an interstate shipment at the place of destination specified in the contract.[20]

Sufficiency of complaint
(1) Where goods for shipment of which to a certain point a bill of lading had been issued were sold under a contract requiring the car to be diverted to other point, buyer's petition, in his action against the railroad to recover demurrage, reconsignment charges, and war tax paid on the railroad's failure to divert the car to other point, alleging the number of the car containing the goods, the issuance of the original bill of lading, and the substitution of another bill of lading binding the railroad to transport the car to other point, was not subject to general demurrer for failure to allege whether the contract for the purchase of the goods was oral or written—Davis v. Stamford Mill & Elevator Co., Tex Civ App., 260 S. W. 1081.

(2) The petition was not subject to general demurrer for failure to allege to whom and at what point the demurrage, reconsignment charges, and war tax were paid—Davis v. Stamford Mill & Elevator Co, supra.

(3) The petition alleging that railroad did not transport the car as obligated to do under the substituted bill of lading, but transported it to the point to which the wheat was originally shipped, and that buyer was required to pay such expenses through the fault and negligence of the railroad in transporting the wheat to such point instead of the point to which it should have been diverted and in delaying the car at such point, was sufficient as against general demurrer, notwithstanding failure to allege railroad's negligence, in view of Rev.St. art 6554, placing burden on railroad to show that delay was not negligent—Davis v. Stamford Mill & Elevator Co, supra.

Immaterial variance
In action by buyer of carload of wheat under a contract requiring seller to divert the car to a point other than that to which it had been shipped, against railroad for demurrage, reconsignment charges, and war tax, which buyer was required to pay because of delay of car at point to which it was originally shipped, to which railroad had moved the car in violation of bill of lading issued in substitution for that originally issued, variance between allegation as to date on which buyer's contract with seller was entered into and proof as to such date was not vital, in the absence of a showing that the railroad was injured by reason thereof—Davis v. Stamford Mill & Elevator Co., Tex. Civ.App., 260 S.W. 1081.

the amount of damages[23] are applicable in actions for delivery at the wrong place, or for failure to divert a shipment in accordance with the contract of carriage.

The measure of damages in actions for conversion for delivery of the goods at the wrong place is stated infra § 184.

§ 177. Delivery without Collection of Charges

Delivery without payment of draft attached to bill of lading is a conversion.

Drafts attached to a bill of lading constitute positive instructions to the carrier to collect before delivering the goods,[24] and a delivery without requiring such payment renders the carrier liable for conversion.[25] In an action by a consignor to recover from a carrier the amount of a sight draft attached to a bill of lading, drawn on the consignee of certain lumber to be delivered on payment of the draft and which plaintiff alleged that defendant had delivered without such payment, defendant could show that the lumber was so inferior to the lumber contracted for that the payments already made covered the value of the entire amount shipped, and that there was therefore no balance due plaintiff[26] Carriage of goods generally with instructions to collect upon delivery is discussed infra § 186.

§ 178. Failure or Refusal of Consignee to Accept Goods

a. In general
b. Duty to notify consignor
c. Duty to return goods

a. In General

The duty of the consignee to accept delivery is not ordinarily excused by the fact that the goods are damaged, unless they are rendered valueless, nor by delay.

The duty of the consignee of goods transported by a carrier to accept delivery thereof, in accordance with the rule stated supra § 160 a, is not ordinarily excused by the fact that the goods are damaged,[27] unless such damage renders the property

Tex—Davis v. Stamford Mill & Elevator Co., Civ.App., 260 S.W. 1081.

Presumptions

(1) Without charge of fraud or bad faith and contrary proof, court must assume price received for fruit which carrier negligently failed to divert was all it was reasonably worth.—Vaccaro Bros. & Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 123 So 355, 11 La.App 348.

(2) Contract price of goods not procurable on open market may be assumed to be actual value, as respects seller's loss from carrier's failure to divert the shipment as directed.—Vaccaro Bros. & Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co., supra.

Interest on claim

Under Federal Control Act March 21, 1918 § 10, Transportation Act Febr. 28, 1920, and Vernon's Sayles Civ St.Annot 1914 art 4981, it was proper in rendering a judgment against the director general of railroads or the agent designated by the president, for demurrage, reconsignment charges, and war tax, which the plaintiff was required to pay because of delay of car at point to which it was transported other than that specified in bill of lading, to allow interest on the claim.—Davis v. practically valueless, having regard to the expense of acceptance and use, and to the purpose for which it was intended,[28] the consignee's remedy as stated infra § 273, in case of partial loss or of injury not rendering the property worthless, being to accept the goods and sue for damages, or, in case the injury renders the property valueless, to reject the consignment and sue for its full value. A consignee may not refuse to accept goods because of delay in delivery,[29] his remedy being to receive the goods and sue for the damages caused by the delay, as stated infra § 222. A consignee of goods which are of little or trifling value and unsalable, however, may refuse to accept them when tendered after a negligent delay in transportation thereof, and may recover damages and the statutory penalty for failure to adjust and pay the claim within the statutory time after filing thereof.[30]

Where a shipper refuses to accept goods consigned to himself, because of damage caused by the carrier, he has the right to order the goods redelivered to him at the point of shipment.[31] Where a carrier which had notified the shipper of the consignee's refusal to accept the goods, and, upon being directed to ship the goods to another point, advised the shipper that it could not comply with the directions because of garnishment proceedings affecting the shipment, but did comply with such directions within a reasonable time thereafter, the shipper could not defend an action for refusal to accept the goods at the point directed, on the ground that the carrier had renounced the contract of shipment.[32] A carrier which, at the shipper's request, agrees to divert the shipment in transit, because of a telegram from the original consignee refusing to receive the same, but which fails to do so, is liable to the shipper for damages resulting from the failure to divert.[33]

Upon refusal of the consignee to receive the goods, the ordinary presumption that he is the owner is destroyed, and the carrier is justified in assuming that such consignee has no authority to direct the further disposition of the goods.[34]

Rights and duties of assignee of bill of lading. The assignee of a bill of lading describing the goods as marked with certain initials, which was procured on the shipper's promise so to mark them, has no right to refuse a tender of the goods to him as holder of the bill, because the shipper failed to mark the goods in accordance with his promise.[35] Where a shipment of goods was diverted at the direction of the shipper, but such direction was not indorsed on the bill of lading, and the goods were not delivered, but sold for charges, the title of the assignee of the bill of lading became absolute on notice that the person to be notified, as indicated on the bill, refused to accept the goods, and it was the duty of the assignee to pay the charges and take the goods, especially if the diversion was not the cause of such refusal and the carrier was not responsible for the diversion.[36]

The carrier's liability for delivery to the wrong person, as affected by the consignee's failure or refusal to accept the goods, is discussed supra § 174 c (1).

b. Duty to Notify Consignor

The prevailing rule is that, on failure or refusal of the consignee to accept the goods, the carrier must give the consignor notice thereof. A few authorities, however, hold that such notice is not necessary except under special circumstances. Where notice is given, the carrier holds the goods as bailee, subject to the consignor's order.

By the weight of authority, affirmed by statute in some jurisdictions, it is the duty of a carrier to exercise due diligence to give the consignor notice,[37] within a reasonable time,[38] of the consignee's failure or refusal to accept the goods, if it could by the exercise of ordinary diligence have known of such failure or refusal.[39] Some authorities, however, have held that the duty of the carrier to give the consignor notice of the consignee's failure or refusal to accept delivery depends upon the circumstances, and is not absolute;[40] that, in the absence of any such requirement in the bill of lading, the carrier is under no duty to give notice to the con-

To whom notice given

Where goods are shipped to the consignor's order, and the bills of lading are sent to a bank at destination, such bank is the consignor's agent for the purpose of presenting the draft only, and not for the purpose of receiving notice that the goods cannot be delivered.—Stoddard Lumber Co. v. Oregon-Washington R. & Nav. Co., 165 P. 363, 84 Or. 399, 4 A.L.R. 1275.

"Order notify" bill of lading

(1) Where goods are consigned by a shipper to its own order, with directions to notify a person named, upon failure of the carrier to deliver the goods, it is not sufficient that it notify such person; but it must notify the consignor, if the bill of lading is sufficient to show that he is the owner of the goods.—Stoddard Lumber Co. v. Oregon-Washington R. & Nav. Co., 165 P. 363, 84 Or. 399, 4 A.L.R. 1275.

(2) Consignor is not chargeable with notice of failure of the person to be notified to accept goods, and carrier must exercise due diligence in notifying consignor of such failure.—Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Ousley Co., 139 S.W. 586, 37 Ga.App. 215.

(3) Where shipper consigned goods to himself for delivery to another on shipper's order, on refusal of third person to receive goods, shipper became unconditional consignee entitled to notice of arrival and reasonable time to make other disposition thereof.—New York, P. & N. R. Co. v. Chandler, 106 S.E. 684, 129 Va. 695.

Applicability of statute

Crawford & M.Dig. § 909, requiring carrier to notify consignor of consignee's refusal to accept freight, whereupon consignor must direct disposition, does not apply to shipment consigned to one not known to the carrier's agent, so as to authorize delivery to person for whom intended on receipt of information as to his identity in response to telegram requesting advice as to disposition.—Missouri Pac. Absence of express refusal

A railroad was under no obligation to seek further instructions from shipper with regard to watermelon shipment, although consignee examined shipment and made no effort to accept it, in absence of express refusal of shipment by consignee.—Sowega Melon Growers Ass'n v. Pere Marquette Ry. Co., Ga.App., 194 S.E. 917.

Question of fact for jury

Whether carrier violated duty in not notifying seller of buyer's refusal to accept shipment was held to be a question of fact for the jury.—Porter v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 231 N.Y.S. 432, 224 App.Div. 440—Porter v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 215 N.Y.S. 727, 217 App.Div. 49.

Effect of provision of demurrage tariff

Provisions of railroad's tariff relating to notice to consignor for purposes of demurrage charges do not fix definitely the duty of the carrier to notify consignor of consignee's failure to accept shipment, but is at least a recognition of the duty to give notice under certain circumstances, and a person familiar therewith may have right to rely on such notice.—Porter v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 215 N.Y.S. 727, 217 App.Div. 49.

signor,[41] unless, under the circumstances of the particular case reasonable care requires that notice be given,[42] or unless the consignor exercises the right of stoppage in transitu.[43] So it has been held that notice to the consignor is not necessary even though required by a rule of the carrier,[44] and that the duty to give such notice is not imposed by the provisions of the Carmack amendment relating to interstate transportation.[45] Notice of the consignee's failure or refusal to accept the goods is excused where the consignor obtains timely notice from other sources,[46] or where the consignee merely neglects to accept or unload the goods, but promises to do so shortly, or gives other indications of that purpose,[47] or where at the time the goods were left with the carrier for transportation the consignor did not disclose his name and residence.[48]

Where goods are shipped to the consignor's order, with directions to notify the purchaser of the goods, the carrier cannot extend credit to the purchaser but must give notice of nonacceptance not later than the day following that on which the goods were offered to him.[49] If the bill of lading provides that the purchaser shall have ten days within which to pay for the goods, the carrier need not give notice until after the expiration of such period.[50]

The return of a draft and bill of lading to the shipper, with notice that the draft has not been paid, is sufficient notice to him that the goods have not been accepted by, or delivered to, the consignee.[51]

Upon failure, without excuse, to give the consignor notice of the consignee's refusal to accept the goods, the carrier is liable to the consignor for the resulting damages,[52] and the burden is on the carrier to show facts relieving it from the duty to give notice.[53]

It has been held, however, that, even if it was the duty of an initial carrier to deliver the goods to the consignee rather than to a connecting carrier, and to give the consignor notice of the consignee's refusal to accept delivery, the mere failure

(2) On the other hand, it has been held that the better opinion is that the carrier is bound to presume, from the consignee's refusal to accept the goods, that the consignor is still the owner thereof, and, to relieve itself from liability as carrier, it should store the goods and notify the consignor.—Fine v. to give such notice would not, of itself, constitute a conversion.[54]

The necessity of notice to the consignor where the consignee refuses to accept a c. o. d. shipment is discussed infra § 186.

Effect of notice. After the carrier has notified the consignor that the consignee has refused the goods shipped, it is liable only as a bailee;[55] it holds the goods subject to the consignor's orders, although the consignee may have given verbal directions for their return,[56] and the consignor is bound to demand delivery of the goods to himself and to take charge of them.[57]

c. Duty to Return Goods

On refusal or failure of the consignee to receive the goods, the carrier need not return them to the consignor unless ordered to do so; but if the carrier receives such order and fails to return the goods it will be liable for the loss in the absence of facts creating an estoppel. Payment of charges may be required as a condition precedent to a return of the goods.

It is not the duty of a carrier, upon failure or refusal of the consignee to receive the goods, to return them to the consignor unless ordered to do so;[58] but the carrier may undertake to transport the goods back to the shipper,[59] or the consignor may order the goods returned to him;[60] and if the carrier on receiving such order acquiesces therein, but takes no action for several months, during which time the goods are destroyed by fire in a warehouse where they were stored, the carrier is liable for the loss;[61] but it has been held that, unless there is an absolute denial by a carrier of a shipper's right to a return of the goods, or unless the excuses for failure to return are unreasonable, inconsistent, or made in bad faith, there can be no conversion by the carrier, even on clear proof of demand by the shipper and failure to return.[62] Where the consignee wrongfully refuses to receive the goods and the carrier returns them to the consignor, on his order to do so, the consignee is estopped to sue the carrier for conversion.[63] The refusal of the owner of goods consigned to himself to accept the same constitutes an abandonment thereof, and precludes him from thereafter asserting that the carrier has converted them, no matter what disposition the carrier makes of them.[64]

Where at the request of the consignee the carrier holds a shipment in its freight station, and during this time an order of stoppage in transit is received from the consignor's assignee, and demand is made for a return of the shipment, the carrier is not bound to return the goods until it has received payment of both outgoing and return charges.[65]

§ 179. Duty to Warehouse Goods and Corresponding Liability of Warehouseman

Upon failure or refusal of the consignee to receive the goods, it is the carrier's duty to store them, and where such duty is performed the carrier becomes liable only as warehouseman or bailee.

Where the consignee fails or refuses to receive the goods shipped, it is the duty of the carrier to store the goods either in its own warehouse or in that of some responsible third person,[66] at the ship-

If the goods are destroyed while in the carrier's possession more than a reasonable time after notice to consignee of arrival of shipment, and

nary care in preserving them,[75] although its liability as depositary, without any agreement for compensation, is for gross negligence only.[76] Where, however, the shipper consigned goods to himself to be delivered to a third person on his order, refusal of such person to receive the goods when he had no written order from the shipper, authorizing delivery to him, did not terminate the carrier's liability as such or render it liable thereafter only as warehouseman, since on such refusal the shipper became the unconditional consignee, and as such was entitled to notice of the arrival of the goods, and a reasonable time thereafter within which to make other disposition thereof.[77]

§ 180. Conversion by Carrier

Whether a carrier is guilty of a conversion where it allows an unauthorized inspection of the goods, supra § 170, or delivers the goods to the wrong person, supra § 174, or at the wrong place, supra § 176, is discussed in prior sections. The question of whether other acts of the carrier render it liable for conversion is discussed infra § 181.

§ 181. Acts Constituting Conversion and Rights and Liabilities Arising Therefrom

a. In general
b. Wrongful refusal to deliver
c. Other acts

a. In General

To be liable for conversion a carrier must wrongfully exercise dominion over the property intrusted to it for transportation, by some affirmative act. Mere nondelivery is not a conversion, nor is there a conversion where the property is lost. If the property is tendered to the consignee after demand, and before suit is brought, he cannot refuse to receive it and sue for conversion.

Not every wrongful act on the part of the common carrier authorizes an action against it for conversion.[78] It is only the wrongful exercise of dominion over another's property that constitutes a conversion,[79] and a mere nonfeasance or failure to perform a duty imposed by contract or implied by law is not a conversion.[80] Mere nondelivery does not constitute a conversion;[81] there must be proof of an actual conversion, not one implied from a failure to deliver.[82] So, the loss or destruction of the goods, after consignee failed to pay freight and receive the tickets entitling owner to possession, the carrier's liability is that of a warehouseman—Houston & T C. Ry. Co. v. J. W Geer & Sons, Tex.Civ.App., 236 S.W. 199.

Effect of provisions in bill of lading

(1) Where a bill of lading provided that property not removed forty-eight hours after notice of its arrival might be kept, subject to charge for storage and to carrier's responsibility as warehouseman only, upon failure of a consignee to remove goods within forty-eight hours after notice from final carrier, liability of initial carrier as carrier ceased.—Dodge & Dent Mfg Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 162 N.Y.S. 549, 175 App Div. 823.

(2) Under a bill of lading providing that property not removed by the person entitled to receive it within forty-eight hours after notice of arrival might be stored in a licensed warehouse at the cost and risk of the owner, a licensed warehouseman, to whom the carrier delivered the goods on performance of the contract of shipment and the consignee's refusal to accept and the shipper's failure to care for them after notice, was the agent of the shipper, through his own default, and was not the agent of the carrier—Model Mill Co. v. Carolina, C. & O. Ry. Co., 188 S.W. 936, 136 Tenn. 211.

Storage not negligence

Where goods were refused by consignee, it was not negligence for the carrier, as expressly allowed by the contract, to store them in a public warehouse, where they were damaged by fire thereafter.—Efland Hosiery Mills v. Hines, 114 S.E. 472, 184 N.C. 356.

Repossession of goods

As regards liability to shipper, carrier, after delivering shipment to and receiving payment from consignee, has no lawful right to repossess itself of property.—Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. McGill Bros Rice Mill, 46 S.W.2d 651, 185 Ark. 108.

Successor carrier

While a consignor of a shipment, delivered to a carrier which afterward goes out of business and is succeeded by another carrier may not, where there is no privity of contract between him and the latter carrier, recover against such carrier on the contract of shipment, yet, where the shipment was not lost through fault of the original carrier, but was delivered by the original carrier to the carrier succeeding to its business, and was by the latter lost, the consignor may recover against the latter carrier for the conversion of the shipment thus actually had and received—American Ry. Express Co. v. Archer, 104 S E. 92, 25 Ga App. 647.

even though resulting from the carrier's negligence, does not amount to a conversion, and the remedy for nondelivery in these circumstances is not by action for conversion but for breach of the duty to transport and deliver,[83] although it has been held that an action for conversion will lie against a carrier for refusal to deliver goods under circumstances indicating that the goods were stolen by its employees.[84] Likewise, as is shown infra § 222, a mere delay in delivery, however unreasonable and long continued, does not, of itself, constitute a conversion. To constitute a conversion, however, it is not necessary that the carrier should have applied the property to its own use, or that it should have derived any benefit therefrom, it being sufficient that it has dealt with the property as if it were its own and in defiance of the owner's legal rights.[85] Whether a demand and a refusal to deliver is essential to a suit for conversion is discussed infra § 183 a. Even after demand, if the goods are tendered before suit brought, it is held by some authorities, the consignee cannot refuse to receive the goods and sue for conversion, his sole remedy being an action for damages resulting from the delay,[86] although, on the other hand, it has been held that, after a conversion of the goods by a carrier, the consignee is not bound to receive them, and that any loss of the goods thereafter must fall upon the carrier.[87]

b. Wrongful Refusal to Deliver

(1) In general
(2) What constitutes wrongful refusal in general
(3) Requiring payment of charges

(1) In General

A wrongful refusal of a carrier to deliver the goods to the person entitled thereto is a conversion, and, after waiting a reasonable time, he may, on demand, sue therefor.

A mere refusal by the carrier to deliver the goods is not conclusive evidence of conversion, although it may, in connection with other facts, establish it,[88] but the refusal of a carrier, without lawful excuse, to deliver the goods to the consignee or person rightfully entitled thereto, constitutes a conversion,[89] and after the consignee has waited a reasonable time he may, on demand, maintain an action for conversion.[90] Even though the consignee has refused, under the influence of a mistake, to receive goods from the carrier, he may maintain an action for refusal to deliver on his subsequent demand when they are still in the hands of the carrier and no other rights have intervened.[91] Although the transportation of goods by a carrier on the requirement of a person unlawfully in possession thereof is not a conversion, as stated infra in subdivision c of this section, yet if the owner of the goods, before delivery, demands them, the carrier is liable for conversion if it refuses such demand.[92] After liability of the carrier for conversion has been established, it may, with reference to third persons, treat the property as its own and itself maintain an action for conversion of such property;[93] and after the shipper has elected to treat the property as converted, on account of wrongful refusal to deliver, and has notified the carrier of such election, he is under no obligation to defend suits relating to the property or to aid the carrier in disposing of it.[94]

(2) What Constitutes Wrongful Refusal in General

A carrier's refusal to deliver goods except on an unreasonable or unlawful condition, or on the signing of a receipt containing an erroneous statement as to the condition of the goods, is a conversion. The mistaken or erroneous statement by the carrier that the goods have not arrived is also a conversion, although there is contrary authority.

The refusal of a carrier to deliver goods except on a condition which is unreasonable or unlawful is equivalent to an absolute refusal and amounts to a conversion,[95] as where the carrier demands excessive or illegal freight or storage charges as appears infra in subdivision b (3) of this section. However, if the refusal to deliver is qualified, and the qualification attached to the refusal is reasonable and made in good faith, it does not constitute a conversion.[96] Since a carrier is not entitled to deliver the goods to a claimant who does not produce the bill of lading, as stated supra § 172, and is guilty of conversion for delivering to one not producing the bill, as shown supra § 174 a, a carrier is not guilty of conversion for refusing to deliver to a person demanding the goods, until such person reasonably shows his right to receive them by producing the bill of lading or otherwise.[97] The carrier is entitled to a reasonable time in which to investigate the claim of the person demanding delivery.[98] Where the consignee, holding a straight bill of lading, refuses to pay a draft for the price of the goods, but credits the amount on a claim against the consignor for prior defective shipments, the carrier is not liable to the consignee for conversion in diverting the shipment on the consignor's order.[99] The carrier has a right to demand a receipt for the goods as a condition of delivery,[1] and may insist on a receipt for the entire consignment where it is ready for delivery,[2] but not before an opportunity is afforded to determine that fact.[3] On refusal of the consignee to sign a receipt stating that the goods were delivered in good condition when in fact they had been unreasonably delayed and improperly cared for in transit, a sale thereof by the carrier constitutes a conversion.[4] Failure of a carrier to deliver a shipment to the consignee on de-

Nature of condition

Where an electric motor was delivered to a carrier for shipment, and the bill of lading acknowledged its receipt in good condition, but when it reached its destination it was found to be damaged, whether the damage occurred before or after the motor was received by the carrier being disputed, and the consignee demanded the motor and offered a receipt for it, but the carrier declined to deliver it unless the consignee would sign a receipt that it was turned over in good condition except "old break," the refusal to deliver the motor to the consignee unless he would sign such a receipt constituted a conversion—Fred F Shields Co. v. No conversion

Plaintiff forwarded to its selling agent over defendant railroad a carload of machinery by a straight bill of lading After the car reached its destination, defendant, at plaintiff's request, substituted an order bill of lading, in which plaintiff was the consignor and consignee, and which provided for the surrender of the bill of lading duly indorsed before delivery of the shipment. Where the goods were held ready for delivery on surrender of the bill of lading at the time of the commencement of the action, and where there was no demand for, or a surrender of, the order bill of lading, and plaintiff could have had the goods at any time if it had wanted them, there was no conversion by the carrier.—J. mand, on account of a temporary inability to make delivery, is not a conversion; such failure not being an absolute refusal to deliver, but only a failure to deliver at a particular time.[5]

A mere mistake of the carrier's agent in stating to the owner of the goods shipped that they have not arrived does not amount to a conversion.[6] On the other hand, it has been held that where goods have actually arrived at their destination, and the consignee, having been notified of their arrival, makes demand therefor, the refusal of the carrier to deliver them, although on the ground that they have not arrived, constitutes a conversion.[7]

Surrender of bill of lading. Under statutes requiring the carrier to deliver possession of goods to the owner on payment of freight charges as shown by the bill of lading, it has been held that the carrier has no right to impose as a condition of delivery the surrender of the bill of lading, but can require its production for inspection only, and its refusal to deliver the goods on tender of payment of freight charges as shown by the bill of lading constitutes a conversion.[8] It does not follow, it has been said, that the bill of lading should be surrendered from the fact that it is required to be presented in order to obtain possession of the goods.[9]

(3) Requiring Payment of Charges

Requiring payment of lawful freight charges before delivery of the goods is not a conversion, but it is otherwise as to a refusal to deliver unless illegal, or excessive freight or storage charges are paid.

As the carrier's lien for freight entitles it to retain possession until the freight is paid, it will not be guilty of conversion in making payment of freight a condition of delivery.[10] If, however, no valid lien for freight charges exists,[11] or excessive freight charges are demanded,[12] a refusal to deliver because of nonpayment of such charges will amount to a conversion, and this is so although only a small excess over the legal rate is demanded, and although the carrier's agent acted honestly and in good faith in demanding the excess.[13] It has also been held that where unlawful charges are demanded by the carrier, and the shipper offers to deposit the amount demanded with the understanding that he would pay the proper amount when ascertained, the carrier is guilty of conversion by withholding delivery, even though the shipper would have made the same tender if only lawful charges had been demanded, where it is also apparent that delivery would have been refused if the lawful charges had been tendered unconditionally.[14] There is a conversion if the carrier refuses to deliver the goods until payment not only of freight but also of charges for which it has no legal claim.[15] So, where there is a positive refusal to deliver unless the consignee pays illegal storage charges, the carrier is guilty of conversion, without any express or formal demand for the goods.[16]

c. Other Acts

An unauthorized delivery without performance of conditions of the shipment or sale of the goods may constitute a conversion, as may or may not other acts of the carrier, the question ordinarily being dependent upon the facts of the particular case.

The carrier is guilty of a conversion when, contrary to the orders of the shipper, it delivers the goods to the consignee without payment of the purchase price,[17] as where goods are sent c. o. d., infra § 186, or without performance of other conditions.[18] The misrouting of goods by the carrier will not constitute a conversion where plaintiff accepted and paid the freight at destination on several cars consigned by him.[19] Where, however, a carrier misdirects the shipment and attempts to

Sale of goods on refusal to pay excessive freight charges

Where the carrier demands excessive and illegal freight charges, and on the refusal of the shipper to pay them declines to deliver the goods, and sells them for the charges, there is a conversion—Panhandle & S. place the additional charge on the shipper, it is answerable to him in conversion.[20] A carrier's failure to execute an order of diversion, which amounted merely to an order to delay completion of the transportation for two days, so that the shipment might reach its destination on a more favorable market, does not constitute a conversion.[21] The fact that goods shipped in a sealed car are transferred to another car for the convenience of the carrier, does not render it liable for conversion if the goods are actually transported to their destination.[22] A carrier removing animals injured by it during transportation for the purpose of having them treated is not guilty of converting them, although the removal was made over the objection of the shipper.[23] The carrier's refusal to spot cars at a designated point on its spur track as demanded by the consignee before paying the freight charges, is not a conversion where the freight charges were never tendered, the offer to give a check in payment did not include demurrage charges, and the check was never issued or tendered.[24] A pipe line company which delivers oil to a purchaser thereof in accordance with the directions of the seller is not liable for conversion in so doing.[25]

Warehousing goods. As has already been indicated supra § 179, the carrier on transporting to destination may place the goods in a public warehouse, and such act will not constitute a conversion.[26]

Transportation of goods for one illegally in possession. A carrier receiving goods from a person in actual, but illegal, possession thereof is not guilty of a conversion by reason of having transported the goods,[27] even though it afterward restores them to such person,[28] although, as stated supra § 181 b (1), the rule is otherwise where, before delivery, the real owner demands the goods, and such demand is refused.

Refusal to accept goods for transportation may render the carrier liable to the consignee for conversion. Thus, where the seller of coal had loaded it on cars for transportation to the buyer, and had done all that was required by the usage of business to further the shipment, but the carrier wrongfully refused to sign the bills of lading or accept the coal for transportation, the buyer had a right of action against the carrier for conversion, and such right was not destroyed because the seller subsequently, under compulsion, billed the coal to another.[29] On the other hand it has been held that a railroad company, having a contract with a coal company to furnish coal for its engines on which the coal company was delinquent, was entitled to refuse to accept for transportation cars of coal consigned to a commercial buyer, and to appropriate such coal to its own use under the contract, where it was necessary to enable the railroad company to operate its trains.[30]

Sale of goods. An unauthorized sale of the goods by the carrier constitutes a conversion.[31] So a railway company's act in disposing of a shipment of hogs after a lapse of only seven days, during which a connecting carrier refused to receive the shipment on account of a federal quarantine and the shipper refused to direct disposition, constituted a conversion where the shipment was sold in a market where the demand was slight and the prices low and the contract for transportation was such that the carrier could have claimed reimbursement for any cost occasioned in holding the shipment, and where it was not likely that the quarantine would last long.[32] On the other hand, as discussed in §

Acts 1920 c. 23, requiring pipe lines as common carriers to receive oil offered to them for transportation and to redeliver on order of the consignor, does not apply to the liability of the pipe line company for conversion of oil, which did not belong to the consignor, transported by it before the statute was enacted.—Hall v. 48, the carrier may under the circumstances be under a duty to sell the goods in order to prevent loss to the shipper, such as in the case of perishable goods, and such a sale does not constitute a conversion,[33] particularly where it is made in conformity to statute and there has been a tender of the balance of the proceeds of sale after deduction for demurrage and advertising charges;[34] but where notice must be given the shipper, a sale without such notice will constitute a conversion rendering the carrier liable for the value of the goods as in other cases of conversion,[35] unless the owner of the goods consents thereto.[36]

§ 182. Waiver of Conversion

The shipper or owner of the goods may waive the wrongful acts of the carrier which would otherwise be the basis for an action in conversion.

The ratification or waiver of a misdelivery by the carrier is discussed supra § 174 c (3). Other acts of the carrier which would amount to a conversion of the goods may also be waived by the shipper or owner thereof.[37] Where a shipper takes possession of goods shipped with such knowledge and intention that a waiver of the carrier's conversion by change of the consignment results, he cannot recall the waiver.[38]

§ 183. Actions for Conversion

a. Conditions precedent
b. Defenses
c. Venue
d. Parties and persons entitled to sue
e. Pleading

a. Conditions Precedent

A demand for the goods and a refusal and a tender of the freight charges is necessary when and only when it is requisite to establish the conversion.

Ordinarily a demand for and refusal to deliver the goods is a condition precedent to the right to sue.[39] No demand is necessary, however, where an actual conversion is shown[40] and, since it is the duty of a carrier to deliver the goods to the consignee in accordance with the contract of shipment, a carrier wrongfully refusing to perform such duty is liable for conversion without a previous demand.[41] If it appears that delivery was made to the wrong person, no demand is necessary because the evidence of the conversion is complete without it.[42] So, where a carrier delivered to one other than the person to whom the bill of lading was indorsed for delivery of the goods on payment of the draft, no demand is necessary to enable the indorsee of the bill to sue for conversion.[43] Where the carrier was never in a position to make delivery at the proper place, a demand is not a prerequisite to an action for conversion,[44] nor is a demand nec-

A statute providing that, should any perishable property remain unclaimed, it shall be the duty of the carrier to sell it at public auction after giving five days' notice supersedes the common law with respect to the manner of selling, and a sale by a carrier without the notice required by statute was illegal, and might be made the basis of a suit for conversion, although the carrier complied with the common law rule with reference to the sale of goods.—Ft Worth & D. essary where the carrier refuses to deliver except on the payment of unauthorized freight charges.[45] A specific tender of the charges is not required where the acts of the carrier show that such tender would have been refused;[46] and, where the refusal to deliver is for other reasons than the nonpayment of freight charges, an action for conversion will lie without a previous demand or payment of such charges.[47] So a consignor's failure to tender the freight charge does not preclude an action against the carrier for conversion in delivering the goods after stoppage in transit where the arrangement between the carrier and shipper was such as fully to protect the carrier and there had been no request for or refusal to pay the charges.[48]

A carrier which wrongfully delivered goods without demanding surrender of the bill of lading is liable in an action of conversion to a bank to which a draft on the consignee with bill of lading attached had been assigned, although the bank did not first exhaust its remedy against the drawer of the draft.[49]

b. Defenses

In general, matter to constitute a valid defense must go to the establishment of the absence of a conversion.

It is not a defense to an action for the conversion of the property of a consignee that the consignor fraudulently misstated the weight of the goods, and that the consignee knew that the bill of lading stated the weight at less than it was and did not notify the carrier thereof,[50] or that a settlement by the carrier with the consignor had been made,[51] or that the consignee had not paid for the goods.[52] Restitution, if plaintiff assented thereto, is, of course, a defense available to the carrier.[53] It is no defense that, after suit was commenced, the carrier offered to deliver the goods.[54] It is a perfect defense for the carrier to show that it has delivered the goods to the true owner or to the person entitled to their possession regardless of the bill of lading.[55] The carrier, however, cannot defeat the consignee's action by showing title in another without connecting itself with the right of such person.[56] If the owner of the goods notifies the carrier of his ownership and that he believes a third person intends to steal and ship them as owner, the carrier, by avowing its intention to ship the goods if tendered to it, waives its right to defend an action by the owner for conversion on the ground that the description of the goods was insufficient to give it notice of the owner's title.[57] Where a carrier received railroad iron for transportation in good faith without knowledge that it was the carrier's own property and thereafter discovered such fact, the carrier could avail itself thereof as a defense to an action for conversion.[58] It is a good defense to a carrier's liability for conversion of the goods consigned for shipment that the goods were seized and destroyed under the police power of the state.[59]

In an action against a carrier for conversion by sale on refusal of the shipper to pay excessive freight, the fact that the shipper and his attorney purchased most of the property was immaterial.[60]

Matters relieving the carrier from liability for conversion because of delivery to a person not entitled to the goods are discussed supra § 174 c.

The motive which controlled the carrier in the conversion is no defense, although it may be shown where exemplary damages are claimed.[61]

c. Venue

An action for conversion by a carrier may be brought where the conversion occurred.

An action against a carrier for the conversion of goods may be maintained in the county where the conversion took place, without regard to whether the carrier received the goods in interstate transportation.[62] If the conversion consists in failure to deliver at the designated destination, the action may be brought in the county where the failure to deliver occurred, that is, the county of destination.[63] When goods are delivered to a carrier for shipment from one county to another, but the goods are not transported at all, and cannot be produced by the carrier, an action for conversion may be brought in the county where the delivery to the carrier and the conversion took place.[64]

d. Parties and Persons Entitled to Sue

An action against a carrier for conversion must be brought by the person having title to or right to the possession of the goods. A person to whom the carrier has delivered the goods upon giving security to indemnify the carrier may intervene in an action against the carrier by the consignee.

As stated supra § 174 a, the shipper alone can sue for a breach of the contract by delivery of the goods to a person not entitled thereto; but where the consignee is the owner of the goods he is entitled to sue for a conversion.[65] A person authorized to take possession of the goods may maintain a suit against the carrier for conversion thereof, particularly where the carrier has accepted his receipt for the goods, as under such circumstances the carrier cannot be heard to question his right to possession.[66] Where plaintiff was the owner of the claim at the time suit was brought, he is entitled to maintain the action, although he was not the owner of the goods at the time of the conversion.[67] One to whom a bill of lading is negotiated, although as collateral security, is the proper party to sue for their entire loss from conversion by the carrier of the goods shipped, the bill of lading being indicia of title and operating to transfer the entire property.[68] Since the delivery of goods to a carrier ordinarily passes title to the consignee, the consignor has no right of action against the carrier for conversion in the absence of anything in the pleadings to take the case out of the general rule.[69]

Where, however, the consignor is also the holder of the bill of lading,[70] or is also the consignee,[71] he may maintain an action for conversion. Where

Santa Anna Gas Co., Tex.Civ.App., 250 S.W. 271, petition dismissed 44 S.Ct. 3, 263 U.S. 725, 68 L.Ed. 526.

Pleadings held sufficient

(1) A complaint, in an action against a carrier for nondelivery of a trunk, alleging that the carrier has refused and still refuses to deliver the trunk and contents, . . . to this plaintiff, and . . . defendant retains the same for his own use and benefit as notice has been given to . . . defendant and demand . . . made for the delivery of the trunk and contents, but . . . defendant has refused and still refuses to either deliver this trunk and contents or to pay plaintiff for same to the damage of this plaintiff, etc., sufficiently alleged nondelivery of the trunk.—Grover v. Hines, 213 P. 250, 66 Mont. 230.

(2) Count for nondelivery of lime by carrier, which was in code form, except that it averred that lime was consigned to third person, that defendant failed to deliver to consignee, and that consignor for valuable consideration transferred the car to plaintiff while in transit, stated cause of action.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. B. F. Roden Grocery Co., 96 So. 912, 209 Ala. 694.

(3) The carrier could not complain that by counts in the complaint plaintiff assumed burden of proving nondelivery to itself or to original consignee.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. B. F. Roden Grocery Co., supra.

(4) Counts alleging plaintiffs delivered lumber to carrier for shipment and that the carrier wrongfully delivered the bill of lading to a purchaser, and after notice of such wrongful issuance wrongfully delivered the lumber to the consignee in the bill of lading and that the purchaser had failed to pay for the lumber, alleged facts showing a duty, a breach of that duty, and a loss therefrom to plaintiffs, and were not demurrable under Code 1907 § 5546.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Williams, 97 So. 817, 210 Ala. 268.

(5) In an action by shippers against a carrier for wrongful issuance of bills of lading to the purchaser of the shipment and for wrongful delivery to the consignees named therein, the shippers were not required to allege that the carrier knew of the conditions of the sale by which bill of lading was to be retained by shippers, as it had no interest in the sale or its conditions.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Williams, supra.

(6) A petition, alleging plaintiff's delivery to an express company of goods for delivery to him in another state, and that thereafter its business was transferred to defendant, and that both companies had refused to deliver the goods, made such a case as, if made by the evidence, was not subject to a general demurrer.—American Ry. Express Co. v. Archer, 104 S.E. 92, 25 Ga.App. 647.

Pleadings held insufficient

(1) Where plaintiff in an action against a carrier for nondelivery of goods shipped on March 25, 1919, does not allege that he was the owner of the property after that date, the complaint does not state a cause of action in conversion, since it is made to appear the conversion, if any, occurred after the date of shipment, March 25, 1919.—Grover v. Hines, 213 P. 250, 66 Mont. 230.

(2) Under a statute which authorizes an allowance of attorney's fees if defendant acted in bad faith or was stubbornly litigious and caused plaintiff unnecessary trouble and expense, a complaint in an action against the carrier for conversion of goods which merely alleges that defendant had so acted as to compel plaintiff to bring a suit to recover the amount due it does not authorize the allowance of attorney's fees.—Central of Georgia R. Co. v. Chicago Portrait Co., 49 S.E. 727, 122 Ga. 11, 106 Am.S.R. 87.

75. Fla.—Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Roe, 109 So. 205, 91 Fla. 762. 10 C.J. p. 276 note 5.

A plea of not guilty in an action against a common carrier for damages for the wrongful delivery of freight to the consignee, denies the wrong alleged as the basis of the action.—Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Roe, 109 So. 205, 91 Fla. 762.

Pleadings held insufficient

(1) In action against express company for failure to deliver, plea not averring sufficient facts from which to deduce conclusion that delivery was made to authorized agent or consignee, or that delivery to one other than consignee was ratified was defective.—Devon Mfg. Co. v. Southern Express Co., 76 So. 39, 200 Ala. 273.

(2) In shipper's action against railroad for nondelivery, following railroad's delivery of goods to shipper's agent, pursuant to agent's plan to defraud shipper, special defense, alleging that shipper was negligent in permitting such agent to handle shipments and have possession of bills of lading in the manner in which the shipments were handled and the manner in which such agent had possession of the bills of lading, were demurrable for lack of any direct allegation that the agent did handle shipments and did have pos-

and variance.[76] A carrier, after answering a complaint for failure to deliver the goods on the theory that it complied with the requirement of the bill of lading with reference to giving notice of the arrival of the goods cannot assert that plaintiff waived notice, since such waiver must be pleaded.[77]

Amendments to plaintiff's pleadings which introduce a new cause of action, where defendant raises timely and appropriate objection thereto, are not allowable.[78]

Special damages are not recoverable unless the facts entitling plaintiff thereto are pleaded.[79]

f. Evidence

(1) Presumptions and burden of proof
(2) Admissibility
(3) Weight and sufficiency

(1) Presumptions and Burden of Proof

The general rules applicable to presumptions and burden of proof in civil actions and actions for conversion generally, are controlling in actions against carriers for conversion.

The general rules of evidence, and those applicable to actions for conversion generally, are controlling as to presumptions and burden of proof in actions against carriers for the conversion of goods received by them for transportation and delivery.[80] The presumption is that the consignee is the owner of the goods and entitled to receive them and sue for conversion thereof,[81] but such presumption is rebuttable.[82] In such cases the burden is on plaintiff to show that the carrier had notice that the named consignee was not the owner and was not entitled to receive the goods upon their arrival at the point of destination.[83] The burden is on the shipper to establish the fact of nondelivery of the goods to the proper party,[84] and that he was injured thereby;[85] and, where the carrier has entered a general denial, the owner has the burden of showing that the freight charges have been paid or tendered, session of the bills of lading in connection with the shipper's business.—Hartford Distillery Co. v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 115 A. 488, 97 Conn. 1.

Wash.—Spokane Grain Co. v. Great Northern Express Co., 104 P. 794, 85 Wash. 545.

Proof unnecessary

"In an action against a railroad company for the conversion of a car of grain covered by a bill of lading held by a bank, the railroad company paid into court the amount demanded by the bank. A milling company intervened in said action, claiming an interest in the money so paid into court. Held, that the railroad company having confessed its liability to pay the amount demanded by plaintiff, as between the plaintiff and the intervener no proof of the value of said car of grain was necessary."—Marsh Milling & Grain Co. v. Guaranty State Bank of Ardmore, 171 P. 1122, 69 Okl. 222, L.R.A.1918D 904.

Evidence admissible under plea of not guilty

In action against common carrier for wrongful delivery of interstate freight to consignee, on plea of not guilty, evidence that bill of lading issued by initial carrier was straight bill, under Act Congr. Aug. 29, 1916 §§ 1–8, 49 U.S.C.A. §§ 81–88, is admissible.—Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Roe, 109 So. 205, 91 Fla. 762.

Variance held immaterial

A variance between declaration seeking recovery from initial carrier as a carrier for delivery without requiring surrender of bill of lading and proof that before the delivery the terminal carrier's liability had become that of warehouseman only, which did not mislead defendant or prevent it from setting up any defense, is immaterial.—Winget v. Grand Trunk Western Ry. Co., 177 N.W. 273, 210 Mich. 100, certiorari denied Grand Trunk Western Ry. Co. v. Winget, 41 S.Ct. 6, 254 U.S. 629, 65 L.Ed. 447.

Cause of injury

Before damages can be recovered as for a conversion of property by a carrier, there must be some evidence from which an inference may be drawn that a delict is the cause of the injury.—Liberty Nat. Bank v. Hines, 104 S.E. 313, 115 S.C. 82.

in order to prove his right to immediate possession of the goods.[86] The burden of establishing a defense interposed by a carrier in an action for conversion is upon the carrier.[87] At common law, a carrier failing to deliver goods received by it for shipment is, with certain exceptions, conclusively presumed to have been negligent, and the burden is on it to prove itself within such exceptions.[88] In an action for misdelivery the carrier has the burden of showing that the person to whom delivery was made was entitled to receive the goods.[89] So the burden is on the carrier to establish a lawful excuse for refusal or failure to deliver the goods in compliance with the demand of the consignee or the holder of the bill of lading,[90] or to show a state of facts relieving it from its duty to notify the consignee, within a reasonable time, that it cannot make delivery;[91] and if the carrier makes delivery without requiring the production and surrender of the bill of lading it has the burden of proving a lawful excuse for such delivery.[92]

Although plaintiff, in an action against a carrier as warehouseman for delivery of the goods to a person not entitled thereto, makes a prima facie case by showing the bailment and loss, the burden of proof as to the carrier's negligence, in the end rests upon plaintiff.[93]

(2) Admissibility

The admissibility of evidence in an action against a carrier for conversion is governed by the general rules of evidence as well as the rules applicable to actions for conversion generally.

Any evidence which is relevant, material, and competent, under the general rules of evidence and the rules applicable to actions for conversion generally, to prove or disprove the issues raised, is admissible in an action against a carrier for conversion,[94] but evidence which is incompetent, or is

Wrongful sale of goods; shifting burden of proof

(1) Burden was on railroad to justify sale of shipment of peaches on consignee's rejection thereof, and, if it failed to sustain such burden, sale amounted to conversion—Pennsylvania R Co v. Gentile Bros Co., 191 N E 369, 47 Ohio App 162, error dismissed 190 N.E 578, 128 Ohio St. 50.

(2) Where consignee showed that his goods were sold by carrier without his consent after they should have been delivered to him, the burden shifted to carrier to show some right to make this sale—Landau v. American Ry. Express Co., 197 N. Y S. 704, 120 Misc. 84.

Evidence held admissible

(1) Testimony of plaintiff's representative respecting contract concerning cottonseed involved in action for conversion although alone it was insufficient to establish contract on which plaintiff based claim of ownership—Atlantic Coast Line R Co v J W Capps Gin Co., 142 So 74, 225 Ala. 166.

(2) Evidence of sale of cottonseed to third party by owner, as explaining loading and as touching damages suffered by carrier's issuance of bills of lading to another.—Atlantic Coast Line R Co. v. J. W. Capps Gin Co., supra.

(3) Evidence that owner offered bond to protect carrier—Atlantic Coast Line R Co. v. J. W. Capps Gin Co., supra

(4) Evidence that another to whom owner contracted cottonseed had advanced money for ginning operations, in owner's action against carrier for issuing bills of lading for seed to person who allegedly first refused to take delivery from owner.—Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. J. W. Capps Gin Co, supra.

(5) Evidence that neither of alleged buyers had insurance on cottonseed in controversy, in owner's not relevant or material on any issue, is inadmissible.[95] Where a bank sued a carrier for conversion of goods shipped by a company which deposited its draft for the price with a bank as security, and later became bankrupt, the papers and files in the bankruptcy proceedings against the shipper should have been admitted in evidence.[96]

Evidence as to damages. The rules adverted to above apply to the admissibility of evidence affecting damages for conversion by a carrier.[97] Evidence of the condition of the goods at the time they were shipped is admissible as tending to show their condition at the point of destination;[98] but when the buyer paid for and inspected the goods at the point of shipment, the condition of the goods at the place of destination has been held immaterial.[99] In an action for conversion by delivery of melons to a produce company not entitled thereto, the testimony of a peddler to whom the carrier sold melons rejected by the produce company, as to the condition thereof, was competent on the question of damages, but not his testimony as to what he sold them for at retail.[1] In such case the court should have confined the evidence on the question of damages to the value of the melons at the time and place of conversion, and excluded testimony as to the expense to which plaintiff was put in investigating and preparing his case.[2]

(3) Weight and Sufficiency

The weight and sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict, findings, or judgment are governed by the general rules of evidence.

The weight and sufficiency of the evidence in actions against carriers for conversion of the goods delivered to them for carriage are determined by the rules applicable in civil actions generally[3] It

(2) To show that plaintiff, who shipped on consignor's order bill of lading with directions indorsed thereon to notify prospective buyer and to deliver to him upon payment of draft, did not intend to and did not transfer the title of the bill to buyer for the goods represented, and that the prospective buyer, did not intend to buy or to receive the title, and that there was no agreement, express or implied, to that effect.—Davis v. has been held that a prima facie case of conversion is established by evidence of the carrier's failure to transport and deliver the goods within a reasonable time;[4] that straight bills of lading and invoices using the word "sold," constitute substantial evidence of an outright sale to the consignee suing the carrier for conversion;[5] and that the fact that the goods were receipted for at their destination by one not the consignee is not evidence of nondelivery to the consignee, in the absence of proof that the receipting person was not authorized to accept the goods on his behalf.[6] Where a carrier, in an action against it for conversion of goods covered by a bill of lading held by a bank, paid into court the amount demanded by the bank, thereby admitting its liability, no proof of the value of the goods was neces-

(2) Evidence held insufficient to show that person presenting arrival notice and letter from consignee authorizing delivery, and to whom carrier issued paid freight bill which enabled holder to obtain delivery, was not consignee's agent.—Salomon Stern, Limited, of America v. Davis, D.C.N.Y., 292 F. 221.

(3) Evidence held insufficient to constitute person to whom shipment was delivered an agent for consignee to receive shipments without consignee's knowledge or consent.—Southern Express Co. v. Freeze, 216 S.W. 303, 141 Ark. 161.

(4) Evidence held insufficient to show delivery to "order notify" consignee.—George C. Speir & Co. v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 140 S.E. 43, 37 Ga.App. 283.

Successor companies

(1) In suit for loss of a shipment delivered to an express company which was thereafter succeeded by defendant company, evidence that consignment had been delivered to defendant's predecessor, and that it had not delivered it to consignee, without evidence authorizing the inference that shipment had left possession of defendant's predecessor before its business had been taken over by defendant, authorized the inference that shipment remained in possession of defendant's predecessor, and was by it delivered to defendant, when it succeeded to its business.—American Ry. Express Co. v. Archer, 104 S.E. 92, 25 Ga.App 647.

(2) Possession, once proved in express company to which a shipment was delivered, is presumed to be in it until the contrary is shown; but, where its business was transferred within three months thereafter to defendant, the inference was authorized that all shipments then in its possession were transferred to defendant, so that whether or not it received shipment was a question for the jury.—American Ry. Express Co. v. Archer, supra.

Surrender of order bill of lading

(1) Evidence held sufficient to support conclusion that flour shipped under an order bill of lading was delivered without surrender of the bill.—Norfolk & W. Ry. Co. v. Aylor, 150 S.E. 252, 153 Va. 575, certiorari denied 51 S.Ct. 26, 282 U.S. 847, 75 L.Ed. 751.

(2) Evidence held sufficient to warrant finding that hay was delivered to party required to be notified by bill of lading without requiring payment of draft attached and production of bill.—Barton v. Louisville & N. R. Co., Mo.App., 196 S.W. 379

Ratification or waiver of wrongful delivery

(1) Evidence held sufficient to show that seller had ratified carrier's delivery, of goods shipped to buyer, to a third person by acceptance from the latter of a large part of purchase price.—Hayes v. Wells Fargo & Co. Express, Mo.App., 206 S.W. 229.

(2) Evidence held sufficient to support finding that the consignee did not waive the misdelivery.—Hines v. Jordan, Tex.Civ.App., 228 S.W. 633, error refused.

Value of goods

(1) Evidence held sufficient to sustain the verdict as to the fair market value of the coal at destination, the "fair market value" being the price which would be agreed on at a given time between a willing seller and a willing buyer in consummating a voluntary transaction.—Eastern Coal & Export Corporation v. Norfolk & W. Ry. Co., 113 S.E. 857, 133 Va. 525.

(2) Evidence held insufficient to sustain a judgment for plaintiff not showing the value of the lumber, the only testimony being as to its value if it was of certain grade, and it appearing that the lumber was not of that grade.—Buschow Lumber Co. v. Hines, 229 S.W. 451, 206 Mo. App. 681.

(3) Where the only evidence offered to show value was that the goods shipped were checked against an invoice, it not being shown how the invoice was prepared, a recovery based on the value stated in the receipt was not authorized.—Landau v. American Ry. Express Co., 197 N.Y.S. 704, 120 Misc. 84.

4. Tex.—American Ry. Express Co. v. Santa Anna Gas Co., Civ.App., 250 S.W. 271, petition dismissed 44 S.Ct. 3, 263 U.S. 725, 68 L.Ed. 526.

(1) Questions of Law and Fact

Where the evidence is conflicting the case should be submitted to the jury; but where the material facts are not in dispute or there is no legally sufficient evidence to warrant submission to the jury the question is one of law for the court.

In accordance with general rules, questions of fact on conflicting evidence should be submitted to the jury,[8] and it is error to withdraw such question from the jury by directing a verdict;[9] but where there is no dispute as to the material facts,[10] or no legally sufficient evidence upon the point involved,[11] the question is one of law for the court, and may be withdrawn by directing a verdict or granting a nonsuit.[12] Whether different conclusions can be drawn from the facts in evidence is a question of law for the court.[13]

Particular issues for jury

(1) In trover for coal delivered to defendant carrier for plaintiff, evidence of number and contents and time of tender of cars was held sufficient for jury.—St. Louis & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Georgia, F. & A. Ry. Co., 104 So. 33, 213 Ala. 108.

(2) Whether consignee authorized delivery of shipment to another was held for jury.—Carter v. St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co., 18 S W 2d 376, 179 Ark. 865.

(3) State of deterioration of shipment of peaches rejected by consignee, necessity for immediate sale, opportunity to give notice to shipper, diligence in securing best price, care used in handling peaches, and time given consignee for inspection, were fact questions for jury in determining whether carrier's sale of shipment constituted conversion.—Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Gentile Bros. Co., 191 N.E. 369, 47 Ohio App. 162, error dismissed 190 N.E. 578, 128 Ohio St. 50.

Justification for sale of perishable goods

Whether a carrier is justified in selling perishable goods to prevent further loss, if the owner cannot be found, is a question for the jury.—Payne v. Roe, 122 A. 322, 143 Md. 282.

Legality of carrier's charges

In an action against a dray company for the conversion of plaintiff's household goods, which it was holding for charges of drayage, held, that the legality of the charge made by the company for the transportation of plaintiff's goods should have been submitted to the jury.—Pittman v. Fort Worth Warehouse & Storage Co., Tex.Civ.App., 258 S.W. 1105, motion granted 263 S.W. 636.

Reasonable time to make delivery is for the court where there is no dispute as to the facts.—Hilbert v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 120 A. 778, 277 Pa. 105.

Time for removal of goods by consignee

Whether a carrier of goods allowed a consignee sufficient time for removal after notice is a question of fact and not of law, where the facts are in dispute or the inferences in doubt.—Koch v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 110 A. 128, 94 N.J.Law 30.

Rule affirmed but held inapplicable

The rule that, where there is no dispute about the material facts, the question of reasonable time in which the goods should have been removed from the carrier's warehouse by the consignee is one of law for the court was held inapplicable.—Wichita Valley Ry. Co. v. Golden, Tex.Civ.App., 211 S.W. 465.

A peremptory instruction for defendant is proper in an action against a railroad company, receivers, and railway company which purchased property on reorganization, for conversion of apples, where plaintiff, alleging railway company has purchased interest of receivers and railroad company and has assumed all obligations, but offered no evidence in support.—Clemmons Produce Co. v. St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co., Mo.App., 204 S.W. 590.

Nonsuit proper

In action against express company for conversion of trunk, where express company admitted the receipt of the trunk consigned to plaintiffs, court properly rendered judgment of nonsuit upon plaintiffs' failure to prove contents of trunk and value thereof, instead of giving plaintiffs judgment for value of the trunk itself, where there was no evidence as to value of trunk.—Johnson v. Western Express Co., 181 P. 693, 107 Wash. 339.

(2) Instructions

The general rules relating to instructions in civil actions are applicable in actions against carriers for conversion.

The rules governing the giving of instructions in civil actions generally are applicable to actions against carriers for conversion. Thus it is the duty of the court to give full and correct instructions on the law applicable to the case.[14] As in other cases, the instructions must not be misleading,[15] or assume as proved matters which are in issue;[16] and instructions on matters not in issue or not warranted by the evidence,[17] or which ignore facts in evidence,[18] are erroneous. Plaintiff is entitled to a proper charge on the measure of damages, and an instruction that the jury should award such damages as they believe plaintiff has sustained, without giving any guide whereby to measure the damages is erroneous.[19]

(3) Findings

Findings must not be inconsistent with the uncontradicted evidence.

Findings by the court, which are inconsistent with the uncontradicted evidence, are erroneous.[20]

§ 184. Measure of Damages

a. In general
b. Damages other than, or in addition to, value of goods
c. Mitigation or reduction of damages

a. In General

The measure of damages for conversion by the carrier ordinarily is the market value of the goods at destination, less freight charges and expenses of sale. Only nominal damages are recoverable where the carrier, after conversion, tenders the goods to the consignee. When taking is willful, punitive damages may be recovered.

The measure of damages for conversion by a carrier of goods intrusted to it for transportation and delivery ordinarily is the value of the goods at the time and place of the conversion, or place of destination,[21] from which should be deducted the

Liability of carrier as bailee

In consignees' action against carrier for value of goods delivered to wrong person, where court charged that, if plaintiffs neglected to get goods for forty eight hours after receiving notice of shipment, carrier's liability changed to that of warehouseman, plaintiffs were entitled to charge that carrier might still be liable as bailee for negligent misdelivery.—Freedman v. True value

Where it appeared that the goods after having been delivered to carrier for transportation and delivery to the consignee were neither delivered to the consignee nor returned to the shipper, a verdict for plaintiff in an amount equal to true value of goods was authorized—American Ry. Express Co. v. Estroff, 121 S E 711, 31 Ga App. 736, conforming to McQuarie v. State, 121 S E. 316, 157 Ga 380, and affirmed 125 S.E. 40, 159 Ga. 58

Provision in bill of lading

The measure of damages is the value of the goods at the time of the conversion, and a provision in the bill of lading fixing the damages for loss or injury does not apply.—Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Effect of federal statutes

(1) Under Cummins amendment of March 4, 1915, to Carmack amendment, U.S Comp St. § 8604a, 49 U.S. C.A. § 20, shippers of coal to tidewater piers, for sale in spot market thereat, could recover, on carrier's confiscation thereof, fair market value at destination, less cost of transportation and expense of sale, notwithstanding provision in tariffs approved by interstate commerce commission that recovery be computed on basis of value at time and place of shipment, there being no impress of nonadjacent foreign commerce, to which Cummins amendment does not apply.—Norfolk & W Ry. Co. v. Nottingham & Wrenn, 124 S E. 398, 139 Va. 748.

(2) Under such act, a provision in the bill of lading that the amount recoverable for loss or damage to the goods shall be their value at the time and place of shipment, is ineffective, and the common-law rule that the damages for misdelivery are the value of the goods at the place of destination at the time they should have been delivered prevails—Smith v. New York, O. & W. R Co., 196 N Y S. 521, 119 Misc. 506

Confiscation of coal

(1) The measure of damages for confiscation of coal by a railroad company while in transit is the market value of the particular coal at the time and under the circumstances when it was taken.—Norfolk & W. Ry. Co v. Ft. Dearborn Coal & Export Co., C C A W.Va, 292 F 78

(2) Where it appeared that the shipper of the coal was a member of a shippers' pool, out of which each shipper was authorized to withdraw a quantity of coal equivalent to that shipped before arrival, the measure of recovery was the fair market value of the coal at destination, less the cost of transportation and the expenses of sale there.—Eastern Coal & Export Corporation v. Norfolk & W. Ry. Co., 113 S E 857, 133 Va. 525

(3) Where coal was in transit to the seaboard for export, and for two

tions ascertain and apply the highest market value between the date of the conversion and the day of the trial.[25]

Where some of the articles converted were second-hand and their market value, if any, would not adequately compensate plaintiff for his loss, the court may properly allow a recovery for the actual or intrinsic value of such articles.[26] Where the conversion consists in delivery at the wrong place, if the owner nevertheless receives the goods for sale and disposal there, the measure of damages is the value of the goods at that point when so received, less the price which they actually brought with due care at the sale, plus the cost of the carriage if the same had not been paid.[27] Where the conversion consists in refusal to deliver the goods on the production of the bill of lading, and a sale by the carrier for the payment of freight and other charges, it has been held that the measure of damages is the interest on the value of the property during its retention and any amount that the property depreciated in value while withheld.[28] If, after a conversion, the consignee accepts a return of the goods, but they are returned to him in a damaged condition, he is entitled to recover damages to cover the depreciation in their value as damaged.[29]

One who has only a special interest in the goods converted can recover only the value of his interest.[30]

Delivery without surrender or indorsement of bill of lading. The delivery of goods to the consignee without the consignor's indorsement on the bill of lading, in violation of its terms, renders the carrier liable, in an action for conversion, for the value of the goods.[31] Where the conversion consists in delivery of the goods without the surrender of the bill of lading, the fact that drafts attached to the bill were for more than the value of the goods does not affect the measure of damages,[32] and plaintiff can-months or more at that time, owing to a strike in the British coal mines, the price of export coal was considerably higher than for coal for the domestic market, the shipper was entitled to the benefit of such enhanced price—Norfolk & W. Ry. Co. v. Ft. Dearborn Coal & Export Co., supra.

(4) Evidence offered by defendant that the coal, which plaintiff intended for export, was to be delivered to a coal pool at the point of destination, from which the shipper had no authority to divert it, and that on delivery there it would be merged in the pool, and the shipper given only a credit for an equal amount of coal in the pool, shows that the damage to the shipper by the confiscation of the coal was the market value of the credit for that amount of coal in the pool—Norfolk & W. Ry. Co. v. Ft. Dearborn Coal & Export Co., C.C.A.W.Va., 280 F. 264.

In absence of evidence of wholesale market price

(1) In shipper's action against carrier for loss caused by carrier's delivery of potatoes to other party without bill of lading, in which there was no definite evidence of the wholesale market price of potatoes at place of delivery, and the only definite measure of damages indicated by the evidence was the price at which the shipper had agreed to sell the potatoes to such other party, the adoption of such price as the fair wholesale market price was proper.—Merchants' & Miners' Transp Co v. Branch, C.C.A.Va., 282 F. 494.

(2) In an action by a coal company against a railroad for the conversion of carload lots of coal in transit, in the absence of anything to show that there was any wholesale market for coal in carload lots at destination at the time, the court of civil appeals was warranted in fixing the coal company's damages from the conversion at the retail price of coal at destination, less the cost of transportation and marketing—Roth Coal Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 215 S.W. 404, 142 Tenn. 52.

Value at place of shipment

Plaintiff in an action for conversion after their arrival at destination, of goods shipped from New York to a foreign country, may not at his election prove the value of the goods in New York as a basis for measuring his damages—Mallory S. S. Co. v. Mitchell, C.C.A.N.Y., 291 F. 53.

Improper pen

In action against a carrier for delivering cattle at the quarantine pen in a stockyard, when they were entitled to be delivered at the "native pen" and were so labeled, the measure of damages is the difference in actual market value at the proper pen and the pen at which delivered, and not the average difference in value between such pens—Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Smith, 75 So. 120, 114 Miss. 302.

Nature of interest

The shipper of furniture, bill of lading attached in the sum of fifty-four dollars, order to notify the consignee, the railroad having delivered the goods to the consignee without payment of the draft and bill of lading, with relation to its right to recover from the railroad as for a conversion, is in a position analogous to that of a lienee or mortgagee, and the measure of its recovery should be confined to the fifty-four dollars, with interest from time of the alleged conversion, the value of its special interest.—W. O. Broyles Stove & Furniture Co. v. Hines, 87 So. 19, 204 Ala. 584.

not recover from the carrier an amount which he voluntarily paid to the consignee in reduction of the purchase price for the inferiority of the goods.[33] So a carrier which delivers the goods without surrender of the bill of lading with draft attached is liable for no more than the actual value of the goods at destination; it is not liable for the amount of the draft unless it is less than such value.[34] On the other hand, it has been held that the receivers of a carrier which wrongfully delivers a shipment without requiring the surrender of the bill of lading are liable to a purchaser of the draft with bill of lading attached for the amount of the draft.[35] A bank which purchased a draft with bill of lading attached can recover for the wrongful delivery of the goods without surrender of the bill, the full amount of the draft, if less than the value of the goods although it charges a portion of the amount of the draft against an existing indebtedness of the customer from whom it purchased the draft.[36]

Nominal damages. Where, after delivery to the wrong person, the carrier secures the goods and tenders them to the consignee in good condition and before suit brought, the carrier is liable only for nominal damages, in the absence of any proof of damages from delay in tendering the goods.[37]

b. Damages Other than, or in Addition to, Value of Goods

Special damages may be recovered under particular circumstances, if not speculative, uncertain, or remote. Interest on the recovery is commonly allowed.

It has been held that where the goods converted had a market value at the destination at the time they should have been delivered, the shipper cannot recover special damages.[38] Nevertheless, special damages which might reasonably have been contemplated by the carrier or with respect to which it had notice, may be recovered.[39] So, where the shipper, at the time he notified the carrier that the original consignee was not entitled to eggs shipped, stated that he had sold them to a third person at a named price per dozen, the shipper was not confined to a recovery of the reasonable market value, but could recover, as special damages, the contract price of the sale to such third person.[40] Special damages not within the contemplation of the parties are not recoverable.[41]

Speculative and uncertain damages, such as loss of profits, cannot be recovered as damages for conversion,[42] nor can plaintiff recover for injury to his business.[43]

Expenses incurred. Expenses incurred while waiting for the delivery of the freight on the statement of the agent of the carrier that the same had not arrived, when in fact it was then in its possession, are too remote to be the basis of a recovery against the carrier.[44] The right to recover expenses incurred for breach of the contract of carriage,

Resale price

A complaint alleging that plaintiff had contracted to sell the goods to a responsible purchaser at their destination for a stated sum, and that the initial carrier was advised to forward the goods promptly, so they could be delivered at the earliest practical time, in order to satisfy plaintiff's customers for or purchasers of the goods, was insufficient to show knowledge by the carrier of the resale of the goods at the stated price, and therefore did not authorize recovery of the resale price, which was in excess of the market price.—Mitsubishi Shoji Kaisha v. Seaboard Air Line Ry. Co., 107 S.E. 136, 181 N.C. 315.

Where carrier knew or should have known of special circumstances which, if established, would authorize an award of special damages, actual notice is unnecessary.—Smedes Bros. v. Morgan's Louisiana & T. R. & S. S. Co., 110 So. 425, 162 La. 289.

Deviation; loss of more favorable market

Where a deviation by a carrier from the route designated in the bill of lading prevented the shipper from diverting the shipment to a more favorable market, as he had intended to do, but the carrier had no knowledge of such intention, the loss of the more favorable market cannot be deemed to have been within the contemplation of the parties as a consequence which might result from misrouting.—Minneapolis, St. P. & S. is discussed in § 160 c (2) supra. What expenses are recoverable for delivery at the wrong place, in an action other than for conversion, is stated in § 176 supra.

Interest. Interest on the value of the goods or amount of recovery has been allowed in many cases;[45] it may usually be computed from the date of the conversion or time when delivery should have been made,[46] although it has been held that, where a carrier delivered goods on a forged bill of lading, interest should be allowed only from judicial demand, and not from the date of delivery, conversion not being willful,[47] and it has been held that where a carrier confiscated coal, but refused to pay the market value, interest may be recovered from the date of the demand.[48]

Statutory penalty. A statute providing that in case of a refusal to deliver property shipped the carrier shall pay the party aggrieved special damages at the rate of five per cent per month upon the value of the goods at the time of shipment for the negligent detention thereof does not apply in an action to recover the value of goods not delivered at all, but converted by the carrier.[49]

Exemplary damages may be recovered where the taking of the property was willful and without regard to plaintiff's rights.[50]

Attorney's fees. In a common-law action for conversion arising out of a carrier's sale of goods for demurrage charges alleged to be unlawful, because of an incorrect application of the published rules, plaintiff's attorney's fees are not recoverable, and the federal statute permitting the recovery of attorney's fees where damages are recovered for violation of the provisions of the federal law relating to discrimination, reparation, and the like is inapplicable.[51]

c. Mitigation or Reduction of Damages

Defendant may show in mitigation of damages for conversion any matters which go to reduce the amount required for just compensation.

Defendant carrier may show, in mitigation or reduction of damages for conversion, any circumstances tending to reduce the amount justly required to compensate plaintiff for his loss.[52] Where the conversion consists in a delivery to the wrong person, if the goods are reclaimed by the carrier and delivered or tendered to the consignee or a person entitled thereto,[53] or the proceeds of a sale of the goods are paid to him,[54] such delivery, tender, or payment will be considered in mitigation of damages.

Priority of rights as excuse

In action by purchaser of coal against carrier for conversion which was willful, deliberate, and in utter disregard of plaintiff's rights and needs, carrier which had contract with same seller for coal was not excused from liability for punitive damages by virtue of any priority of rights, especially where it had received, not only its own maximum quantity, but in excess thereof, and to exclusion of plaintiff.—St. Louis & S. Matter not constituting ground for reduction of damages

A carrier could not reduce liability for confiscation of coal in transit over its line to tide water piers, for sale in spot market thereat, by allocating confiscated cars to Great Lakes' ports, after interstate commerce commission ordered embargo on shipments east until certain percentage of cars was consigned to lakes, its duty being to refuse to accept cars at mines, or stop them until properly rerouted.—Norfolk & W. purchase price, contrary to the shipper's orders, the carrier may show in mitigation of damages that the consignee had paid for the goods subsequent to the conversion.[55]

The general rule that it is the duty of plaintiff to minimize damages so far as possible does not require the shipper of goods converted by the carrier by delivery to the consignee without the shipper's indorsement on the bill of lading to accept the consignee's check in partial payment of the demand in order to reduce the loss, even if the balance could afterward be collected.[56] A rejected offer of compromise, made to the consignee by a person to whom the goods were wrongfully delivered, for the purchase thereof and payment of a profit on the same, is not ground for mitigation of damages.[57]

The fact that plaintiff made no attempt to obtain a shipment from the carrier until many months after its misdelivery was not ground for mitigation of damages, since the cause of action arose from the moment defendant placed the goods beyond its power to deliver[58]

§ 185. Effect of Final Delivery

Broadly speaking, upon a final delivery the rights, duties, and liabilities of the carrier with respect to the goods are at an end.

The liability of a common carrier as such continues until there has been a sufficient delivery of the goods to the consignee or person entitled thereto,[59] or a waiver of such delivery;[60] but where there is a complete legal delivery in accordance with the rules stated supra § 160 et seq the rights of the carrier[61] and its duties and liabilities,[62] with respect to the goods, whether as carrier or warehouseman,[63] ordinarily terminate, even though the consignee refuses to receive them because damaged,[64] and any further obligation on its part must arise out of a new and different contract.[65] If the carrier subsequently delivers the goods to another at the consignee's request, it is acting as his agent.[66] In accordance with the general rule above stated, where there has been a complete legal delivery, the carrier is relieved from liability for loss or injury thereafter occurring by fire or other cause, although the goods remain on the carrier's premises, and never come into the actual possession of the consignee or owner,[67] at least in the absence of gross negligence on the part of the carrier.[68] In case of live stock shipments, however, the liability of the carrier is not confined to losses occurring during the time the stock is actually in its possession. If the cause of a loss occurring after its delivery to the owner is a cause which began to operate while it was in the carrier's possession and is a cause for which it is responsible, it will be liable without regard to the time when the effects developed.[69] Although delivery is not made at the proper place, yet if the owner subsequently obtains possession of the goods, the carrier is not liable for a loss thereafter occurring.[70]

§ 186. Goods Carried C. O. D.

a. In general
b. Duties and liabilities of carrier
c. Remedies of carrier

a. In General

The duty of a carrier to collect the amount due the consignor, upon delivery of the goods, arises only by contract.

The peculiarity of shipment of goods c. o. d. (meaning collect on delivery), which is usually undertaken only by express companies, is that a condition is attached that the carrier on delivery to the consignee shall collect a specified sum of money, usually the purchase price of the goods (and other than transportation charges), and shall return the sum thus collected to the consignor. Since it is well settled that there is no common-law duty devolving on an express company or other common carrier to act as the collecting agent of the shipper, such obligation arises only by contract express or implied,[71] and is one which the carrier may enter into or refuse at its option.[72] A contract by which the carrier undertakes to collect on delivery may be verbal, and need not be incorporated in the receipt or bill of lading, although in such case the proof of the undertaking must be clear and explicit.[73] The contract may be implied where the carrier accepts the goods for transportation with instructions not to deliver them until they are paid for, or where they are so clearly marked as to indicate that payment is to be a condition of delivery;[74] but it has been

Loss by fire

(1) Where one car was unloaded by the carrier and the goods placed in a warehouse and another car was placed for unloading and a portion of the shipment removed by the consignee, who signed receipts for both cars, there was a delivery, relieving the carrier from liability for the subsequent destruction of the shipments by fire.—Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Johnson, 193 P. 729, 69 Colo. 252.

(2) Where consignee had ample opportunity with which to remove the goods after notice of their arrival, the carrier is not liable for the subsequent destruction of the goods by fire.—Wood v. Louisiana & A. Ry. Co., 104 So. 306, 158 La. 504.

Loss by freezing

(1) Where railway delivers a carload of vegetables to consignee, who accepts same and starts removing vegetables from the car, the railway's responsibility for the safety of the vegetables ceased, and, where vegetables remaining in car freeze, the railway is not liable for damages sustained.—Lynch v. Union Pac. R. Co., 172 P. 1061, 65 Colo. 152.

(2) Where fruit dealer accepted carload of bananas, but was not permitted to unload until payment of freight, carrier was not liable either as carrier or as warehouseman when bananas became frozen and chilled, there having been a complete delivery.—Gus Datillo Fruit Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 65 S.W.2d 683, 251 Ky. 566.

(3) Where potatoes shipped by rail and steamer had been in steamship company's warehouse at destination to knowledge of consignee more than six days, railroad which handled shipment was not liable for loss by freezing, its carrier's liability having terminated.—Barber v. Implied contract not shown

As to prepaid shipments of coal consigned to a coal exchange for account of shipper and under regulations of exchange, loaded on ship for account of other members, course of dealing between shipper and carrier was held not to show an implied contract by carrier to collect, from those for whose account the coal was so reshipped, the freight prepaid by the original shipper.—Pennsylvania R. held that where a receipt given by the carrier for the goods does not contain the condition that payment shall be made on delivery, the carrier is not bound although it was instructed to deliver with that condition;[75] that merely marking a package "c. o. d." is not sufficient where the receipt issued by the carrier contains no such characters, nor any language indicating an undertaking by the carrier to collect from the consignee the amount due;[76] and that the words "please collect," written on the bill accompanying a parcel is a request only, and the acceptance thereof by the carrier does not show a binding agreement to comply with the request.[77]

Title to goods in transit. There is a conflict of authority as to whether the delivery of goods to a carrier for shipment c. o. d. passes title to the buyer, as is discussed in the C.J.S. title Sales § 276, also 10 C.J. p 278 note 32–p 279 note 35, and 55 C.J. p 591 note 60–p 592 note 68. The question also arises in connection with the transportation of intoxicating liquors, in determining the place of sale as affecting criminal responsibility. This is treated in the C.J.S. title Intoxicating Liquors § 249, also 10 C.J. p 279 note 33, and 33 C.J. p 598 note 80 [a].

(1) In General

A carrier is bound to a strict compliance with its contract to act as agent for the consignor in collecting the amount due on a C. O. D. shipment, and is liable to the consignor for a failure to collect, unless the latter waives his rights, or unless other circumstances exist relieving the carrier from liability. The consignee must either pay for the goods or return them. A third person who pays the charges and receives the goods acquires an interest therein.

When a carrier makes a contract to collect on delivery, it stands with reference to it just as any other agent,[78] and is bound to a strict compliance with its undertaking.[79] The carrier acts as bailee to transport the goods,[80] and as agent to collect the price.[81] Where the carrier undertakes to transport goods C. O. D., it is bound to collect the amount due and return it to the shipper,[82] and, ordinarily, if the carrier delivers the goods without receiving the amount to be collected, it is liable to the consignor therefor,[83] but the consignor may by his acts waive any rights he may have against the carrier for its breach of duty in this regard.[84] Where the price of a C. O. D. shipment was paid to the carrier by the consignee, and by collusion between the carrier and consignee the money, while in the carrier's possession was garnisheed by the consignee, the consignor could recover from the carrier as for money had and received, and no duty rested on the consignor to defend the garnishment proceedings.[85] Under a rule adopted pursuant to the Interstate Commerce Act, requiring the consignor to mark on packages shipped C. O. D. those letters, together with the name and address of the shipper, and the amount to be collected, it is not the duty of the carrier to so mark the goods.[86]

Construction of receipt
Where two packages, intended to be shipped C. O. D. were delivered to the carrier, but one of the packages was not so marked, the issuance of a receipt by the carrier for "1 box & 1 bolt of cloth C. O. D." was not an agreement by the carrier to mark either of the packages for the consignor, and hence the carrier accepted for transportation and de-

Effect of fraud. Where the consignor informs the carrier's agent that he desires to send an interstate shipment C. O. D., but the agent fraudulently issues a straight bill of lading, which he represents to the consignor is an order bill, and the goods are delivered to the consignee without payment, the carrier is liable to the consignor for the value of the goods, and it is immaterial that the fraud was not willful, or that the consignor was negligent in failing to read the bill of lading.[87] Where, by the fraud of the consignor, the consignee becomes entitled to the return of the money paid by him on a C. O. D. shipment, the carrier may return it to the consignee without incurring any liability to the consignor.[88] Where goods were sent C. O. D. at the consignor's risk, and the carrier's agent knew that they showed signs of wet damage, it was his duty to disclose such fact to the consignee before demanding and receiving payment therefor; and the fact that the company had remitted the purchase price to the consignor before receiving notice from the consignee that the goods were worthless did not relieve it from liability, if the notice was within a reasonable time.[89]

Defenses to liability. A carrier is not liable for delivering the goods without making collection where the amount to be collected was thereafter paid by the consignee direct to the consignor;[90] but where a cause of action has accrued to the consignor because of the carrier's delivery of the goods without collecting the charges, the carrier cannot exonerate itself from liability by a return of, or an offer to return, the goods to the consignor.[91]

Duties of consignee. A consignee who receives a C. O. D. shipment is bound either to pay therefor or return the goods.[92]

Rights of third persons. A third person who, at the request of a buyer of goods shipped C. O. D., makes the required payment and receives the goods, acquires an interest therein sufficient to secure the amount paid by him, superior to any rights of the seller arising from an agreement between the latter and the buyer, not known to the payer.[93]

(2) Failure of Consignee to Accept and Pay for Goods.

The carrier fully performs its duty by tendering back the goods to the consignor after the consignee's refusal to accept and pay for them. Ordinarily, the carrier must give the consignor notice of such refusal, after affording the consignee a reasonable time in which to accept and pay the charges. A return of the goods to the consignor must be made within a reasonable time.

The duty of the carrier of goods shipped C. O. D. is fully performed where, after the consignee refuses to receive and pay for them, it tenders back the goods to the consignor.[94] Ordinarily, it is the duty of the carrier to give notice to the consignor of the failure or refusal of the consignee to accept and to pay for the goods,[95] after allowing the consignee a reasonable time in which to do so.[96] It has been held, however, that in the absence of an agreement there is no duty or obligation on the carrier to give such notice,[97] and that, where there has been no absolute refusal to accept the goods, and the consignee has promised to call for the goods and to take them away within a short time, the carrier is not chargeable with negligence in failing to give immediate notice to the consignor of a delay in the acceptance of the goods.[98] A return of the goods to the consignor after the consignee's refusal thereof must be made within a reasonable time.[99]

Where the consignee notified the carrier that he was not ready to take up a C. O. D. shipment on its arrival, it has been held to be the carrier's duty to store the goods and to hold them a reasonable time to enable the consignee to pay.[1]

(3) Liability for Conversion.

A carrier which delivers the goods but fails to collect from the consignee the amount of C. O D. charges is liable as for a conversion, although under some circumstances it has been held liable only for breach of contract.

A delivery to the consignee of goods accepted for shipment C. O. D., without collecting the charges, constitutes a conversion by the carrier.[2] So, a carrier wrongfully holding the proceeds of a C. O. D. shipment, in order to permit the consignee to garnishee the same, is liable for a conversion.[3] On the other hand, it has been held that a carrier is liable for breach of contract and not for conversion where, after having received a C. O. D. shipment for transportation, it returns it to the place of origin and offers to deliver it to the shipper on payment of the return charges, because of a statute preventing it from making delivery without paying a heavy occupation tax.[4]

(4) Right of Consignee to Inspect Goods

Ordinarily the carrier may allow the consignee to inspect goods shipped C. O. D., unless such inspection is forbidden by the consignee before payment, and in permitting an inspection and trial the carrier incurs no liability to the consignor even though the goods are rejected.

When goods are forwarded by an express company, to be paid for on delivery, the consignee is ordinarily entitled to a reasonable opportunity to examine the goods, to ascertain whether they answer the description of those ordered by him.[5] This right also exists in the case of interstate shipments,[6] although where a rule in the tariff on file with the interstate commerce commission forbids inspection unless instructions permitting it are written or printed on the C. O. D. envelope, or the consignor subsequently authorizes inspection, an express company must refuse to allow inspection by the consignee.[7] In any event, a C. O. D. shipment does not necessarily forbid an inspection and trial, and where the consignee, under the contract, is entitled to inspection and trial, the carrier, in permitting the same is not chargeable with conversion, even though it permits the temporary use and possession of the goods for the purpose of trial.[8] By permitting the consignee a reasonable opportunity to examine the goods, the carrier is not liable to the consignor, even though the examination results in rejection of the goods.[9] A carrier, however, should exercise care to prevent loss or injury to the goods during the inspection.[10] The consignee is not entitled to the right of inspection where the goods were put up and sealed in his presence and forwarded to him by his directions;[11] and if the consignor forbids the consignee to inspect the contents of the package until payment is made, it is the duty of the carrier to obey the instruction, and if in violation of such instruction it permits the examination of the contents, and the consignee refuses without cause to receive the goods and to pay the sum required, the company is liable to the consignor for damages.[12] Where the carrier is directed not to permit an inspection, it incurs no liability by returning the goods to the consignor on refusal of the consignee to accept the goods without examination.[13]

(5) Liability as Warehouseman.

Where a carrier has transported goods shipped C. O. D. and given the consignee a reasonable time for their removal, its liability as carrier ceases, and its liability as warehouseman begins.

Where the transportation of goods sent C. O D. has been completed and notice given to the consignee and a reasonable time allowed him for the removal of the goods, the liability of the carrier as such is at an end and the less stringent liability of warehouseman commences.[14] Such also is the liability of the carrier where the consignee refuses to accept the goods.[15]

(6) Actions against Carrier

A condition on an express receipt that claims must be presented in writing within a specified time does not apply to a claim for money collected on a C. O. D. shipment. In an action against a carrier for failure to collect on such a shipment or to return the goods, the usual rules apply as to presumptions and burden of proof, questions of law and fact, and instructions The amount of recovery is ordinarily the amount which should have been collected.

A condition on an express receipt that claims must be made in writing, within a specified time, applies only to the express company's liability arising out of breach of duty as a common carrier, and not to claims for money collected on C. O. D. shipments and not remitted as required.[16] The consignor, and not the consignee to whom the carrier had delivered the goods without collecting the C. O. D. charges, is the proper party to sue the carrier for the loss sustained, where the consignee claimed no right to sue, and his acceptance of the shipment was not as consignee, but merely with the intention of minimizing the carrier's damages.[17] Where the carrier is sued for failure to remit the amount to be collected on a C. O. D. shipment, or to return the goods, or for unauthorized delivery to the consignee who refused to pay the charges, the usual rules are applicable with respect to presumptions and burden of proof,[18] questions of law and fact,[19] and instructions.[20] When plaintiff shows delivery of a C. O. D. shipment to defendant carrier, and defendant's failure to return the goods or remit the amount to be collected, the jury could infer that the goods had been delivered to the consignee, and the burden was on defendant to overcome such prima facie case.[21]

Amount of recovery. For breach of a carrier's duty to carry and deliver, as bailee of a C. O. D. shipment, the carrier is liable, as in any other case of misdelivery, for the value of the goods; but for breach of its duty, under such a shipment, to act as collecting agent for the consignor, the carrier is liable for whatever could have been collected if such duty had been performed,[22] and it has been held that if, in such case, the carrier can be sued in conversion for a delivery without making the required collection, nevertheless, the carrier's obligation arises from the contract, and the amount of recovery will be the contract amount, and not the value of the goods.[23] The amount of recovery is measured by the damage sustained, and is not a debt or other liquidated claim.[24] A carrier delivering a C. O. D. shipment of plants without collecting the charges, is liable for the loss occasioned by inability to complete a resale of the plants because of deterioration resulting from the delay incident to the unauthorized delivery, with credit for the express charges on the shipment.[25] Where the carrier delivered a C. O. D. shipment to the consignee, and in payment therefor accepted a forged check, and the presumption in favor of the collectability of the consignor's demand was rebutted by the circumstances, the limit of recovery was the value of the goods surrendered. In such case, the carrier may show, in mitigation of damages, that collection was impossible, although cash had been demanded.[26]

c. Remedies of Carrier

A carrier delivering goods without collecting C. O. D. charges has a right of action against the consignee for the amount paid by it to the consignor, the general rules as to presumptions and burden of proof and questions of law and fact apply.

Where a carrier delivers goods to the consignee without collecting the c. o. d. charges, and is compelled to pay the consignor the amount it should have collected, the carrier has a right of action

O. SEIZURE OF GOODS UNDER LEGAL PROCESS AS EXCUSE FOR NONDELIVERY

§ 187. In General

Where goods are taken from a common carrier under legal process, fair on its face, the carrier is excused from further liability.

While there is some authority to the contrary,[31] it is the general rule, so stated in Corpus Juris which has been cited as authority therefor,[32] that, where the goods are taken from the possession of a carrier, thereof by due legal process, such as attachment, replevin, or search warrant, against the owner, the carrier, subject to certain limitations hereafter enumerated in this section, is excused from further liability, if it acts in good faith and without negligence in surrendering the goods, and such surrender on the part of the carrier does not amount to conversion.[33] The remedy of the consignee or consignor, as the case may be, if he can show title in himself, is not against the carrier but against the officer who has wrongfully seized the goods, or against the party instituting the proceedings under which the seizure was made, if he directed the seizure.[34] In order for the carrier to be protected, however, it is necessary that the seizure be made without its own procurement, fraud, or connivance.[35] It is also necessary, if the carrier is to be protected, that the process, if the seizure be made under process, shall be fair on its face.[36] While it has been held to be the duty of the carrier

31. In West Virginia it has been held that it is no defense to a claim of the consignee that the goods have been attached or seized by virtue of any judicial process. The contract of the carrier is that it will deliver the goods, in good order and condition, to the shipper or to his assigns. It thus guarantees to protect the possession of the shipper and his assigns. It has the right of possession of the goods as against the sheriff and can interpose in the replevin suit, and have an immediate trial of the right of the sheriff to take them from its possession—Neill v. Carrier as warehouseman

If goods, while in carrier's custody as warehouseman, are seized under process of law, carrier is relieved from liability to consignor on proof of prompt notification to shipper of such seizure—Moor v. Southern Pac. Co., 132 S.E. 920, 35 Ga.App. 288.

Good defense

That property was taken from carrier under fair legal process, notice of action being given to the shipper, is a defense to an action for failure to carry or deliver the property shipped—Pecos Valley Trading Co. v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 174 P. 736, 24 N.M. 480.

Order of bankruptcy court requiring carrier to deliver lumber to assignee's receiver in bankruptcy is a legal process fair on its face and sufficient to justify such delivery and relieve carrier from liability to shipper, who had attempted to stop the lumber in transit. Nevertheless the railroad company delivering lum-to exercise due diligence to ascertain whether the process is in fact legal,[37] it has also been held that, if the process is fair on its face, the carrier need not go behind it to ascertain whether or not it is in fact valid.[38] If the process is void on its face, it affords no protection.[39]

If the goods are not actually taken from the carrier, legal process will furnish no excuse for failure to transport or to deliver.[40] Furthermore, a carrier will be liable for failure to deliver, in case the goods were not subject to seizure, as, for instance, where the goods were seized under process against one not the owner,[41] or where the goods cannot be lawfully attached on mesne process.[42]

Where the bill of lading exempts the carrier from liability for loss of goods taken from it by authority of law, the carrier is not liable if the goods are taken from it by legal process against the owner.[43]

Protection of carrier from loss under garnishment see the C.J.S. title Garnishment § 61, also 10 C.J. p 283 notes 86-92, 28 C.J. p 85 notes 5-8.

Notice to owner. Where a carrier having goods in its hands for carriage surrenders them under legal process, it should, to relieve itself from liability, at once notify the owner of the fact, in order that the latter may seasonably assert and fully protect all his interests.[44] On the failure of the carrier to give such notice, it either becomes absolutely liable or assumes the burden of proving the regularity of all proceedings on which the goods were taken, unless it can show that the owner had actual knowledge from other sources in due time to assert his rights, or unless, under the circumstances of the particular case, no notice could possibly have given the consignors an opportunity to protect themselves.[45] If the carrier has failed to give timely notice to the owner, it is not protected by the fact that the writ is regular on its face, if it is void in law.[46] If, however, the notice is promptly and properly given, an action for conversion will not lie, for the carrier has a right to presume that the party notified will attend to his property and protect it in the suit;[47] and no duty rests on the carrier to defend the suit or to exert itself to save the goods, where seasonable notice has been given the owner.[48]

Statute limiting seizure or levy. A statute providing that, if goods are delivered to a carrier by

ber which shipper had stopped in transit to consignee's receiver in bankruptcy is not liable to shipper, even though order of bankruptcy court for such delivery should not be considered legal process fair on its face, the delivery being damnum absque injuria, so far as plaintiff is concerned.—Morgan v. the owner, or by a person whose act in conveying title to them to a purchaser for value in good faith would bind the owner, and an order bill is issued for them, they cannot thereafter, while in the possession of the carrier, be attached by garnishment or otherwise be levied on under an execution, unless the bill first be surrendered to the carrier or its negotiation enjoined, requires, to exempt the carrier from liability, that the bill of lading shall have been delivered to the carrier by the owner or by a person who could convey title so as to bind the owner.[49] Such a provision does not prohibit the true owner of goods which a bailee has wrongfully shipped under an order bill from replevying the goods.[50] It does not apply to an injunction order or other process interfering with the rights of the holder of the bill; thus, while a carrier, restrained from removing, transporting, or disposing of a shipment of goods, must notify the shipper, it is not obliged to question the validity of the injunction and seek its dissolution, and it may obey the order without liability.[51]

Seizure in foreign country. The seizure and detention of goods in a foreign port by properly constituted legal officials under the existing laws is a legal excuse for the failure of the connecting carrier, from whom they were seized, to deliver them to the consignee.[52]

§ 188. Seizure under Police Regulations

A common carrier is not liable for goods seized under the police powers of the state. A seizure without process will not relieve the carrier of liability unless the seizure was made by authority of law.

According to the weight of authority, a common carrier is not liable if goods in its hands for carriage are or become, without its fault obnoxious under a statute or regulation promulgated under the police power of the state, and are seized or destroyed by public authority;[53] and, if the officer has authority to seize the goods, the carrier is protected, although the officer thereafter wrongfully destroys the goods, the act of the officer destroying the goods being his own act with which the carrier has nothing to do.[54] The fact that the statute under which the goods are seized is unconstitutional will not render the carrier liable, if, at the time of the seizure, the statute had not been judicially declared unconstitutional.[55] While the carrier may appear in court and contest for the rightfulness of its possession, it is not bound to do so, but may notify the owner of the property and call on him to carry on the litigation.[56] As in the case of goods seized under attachment or execution, in order to protect the carrier, it is necessary that the seizure be made without the procurement or contrivance of the carrier,[57] that the proceeding or process under which it was made appear to be valid,[58] and that the carrier give prompt notice to the owner.[59] It has been held, however, that, where the goods so seized are properly considered to be the property of the state, rather than as owned by the shipper or consignee, the carrier is accountable only to the state and is not obliged to give notice to the shipper or consignee of their seizure by a state officer.[60]

Seizure without process. To excuse a carrier from liability for the seizure of a shipment by officers acting without process, it must appear that the officers so acting were authorized by law to make the seizure.[61] Where public officers make an apparently lawful seizure of goods as an incident to the arrest of the consignor, the carrier is exempt from liability for the value of such goods where it is not negligent or at fault in yielding to such seizure.[62]

It has been held that, under the general principle that a common carrier is liable for all losses which occur while the goods are in his possession, not caused by act of God or by the public enemy, a carrier is liable for the value of liquor seized from it by the military by force and without legal process or justification.[63]

§ 189. Rights of Officer Levying on Goods

An officer paying the carrier's charges is subrogated to the carrier's lien.

If the officer seizing the goods under legal process pays the carrier's charges so that he may take the goods, on doing so he is subrogated to the carrier's lien.[64]

P. LIABILITY AND ACTIONS FOR DELAY

§ 190. General Rules of Liability

The federal law governs the question of a carrier's liability for delay in a case involving an interstate shipment.

The existence and nature of a liability on the part of a carrier because of a delay in the transportation depends primarily on whether there was, infra § 193, or was not, infra § 191, a special contract of carriage, and whether or not the delay was excusable, infra §§ 197–207. The existence and extent of the liability on the part of initial, intermediate, or terminal connecting carriers for delay is considered infra §§ 416, 425. Questions as to the limitation of a carrier's liability for delay is considered supra §§ 88–117. The liability of a lessor railroad for the negligence of its lessee causing a delay in the shipment of goods or live stock is treated in the C.J.S. title Railroads § 355, also 51 C.J. p 1093 notes 68, 69. The duty of a carrier to receive and transport property is considered supra §§ 27–34.

What law governs. The liability of a carrier, which accepts an interstate shipment, for damages under the common law for negligence in failing to deliver it promptly is to be determined under the federal laws.[65]

contract a carrier is not an insurer against delay in the transportation of goods, and the principle on which the carrier's extraordinary liability, supra § 71, is founded does not extend to the time occupied in transporting the goods.[67] As to the time of delivery, the carrier's liability stands on the same ground as that of ordinary bailee for hire, being dependent on negligence.[68] The rule is, therefore, one of general application that, in the absence of special contract binding the carrier to deliver within a specified time, mere delay in transportation does not create any liability to respond in damages.[69] As to the diligence and care required in completing the express or implied contract for transportation only, the rule is that the carrier is bound to use reasonable diligence and care, and that only negligence will render it liable, unless a stipulated time is fixed in the contract.[70]

Not applicable to prompt transport

The liability of a carrier as an insurer is applicable only to a failure to deliver the shipment intact and uninjured as it was when received, and is not applicable to prompt transportation, and as applied to animate freight relates only to a physical injury or destruction or loss of any of them, but even this rule does not apply when the shipper accompanies the shipments.—Hines v. Absence of negligence is excuse

In cases where delay is the ground of a cause of action against a live

Nevertheless, if damage results from failure without good excuse, to deliver the goods at their destination within a reasonable time, the carrier is liable for such damage.[71] When a common carrier undertakes to convey goods, the law implies a contract that they shall be delivered at destination within a reasonable time, in the absence of any special agreement as to the time of delivery.[72] This duty, it is said, is as obligatory as the duty to deliver safely;[73] and the principle applies, although there is a written contract for the shipment which contains no stipulation as to the time within which the goods are to be delivered. The law will nevertheless imply an undertaking to carry within a reasonable time.[74] If a delay in transportation shall occur from whatever cause, the carrier must take care, by such steps as lie within its power, to protect the goods shipped, to the end that the same shall be fully insured against increased danger or injury on account thereof, and the requirement for commensurate care is equivalent to the highest degree of care possible to the situation and necessary to safety.[75]

Live stock and perishables. The general rule that, in the absence of special contract, a carrier is bound to transport and deliver goods with reasonable diligence, care, and dispatch and is liable only for negligent or unexplained unreasonable delay applies to shipments of live stock[76] and other perish-stock carrier the absence of negligence excuses the carrier.—Crowdis v. Quincy, O & K. C. R. Co., Mo App, 255 S W. 347.

Delay must be unreasonable

Carrier held not liable for damages from delay in interstate fruit shipment, in absence of evidence of unreasonable delay.—Catanzaro & Sons v. Southern Pac. Co., 90 Pa.Super. 578.

Forwarding, delivering, and transporting goods

Railroad need use only reasonable care, diligence, and exertion in forwarding, transporting and delivering goods.—Free Bros. Co. v. Baltimore & O. R. Co, 146 A. 98, 296 Pa. 441.

Ordinary time and manner not criterion

In action for damages from delays to shipment of show cattle, special issue, making test of liability of railroad its failure to carry cattle in "usual and ordinary time and manner," was erroneous, as test of liability for damages, for delay is failure to transport with reasonable diligence and dispatch.—Davis v. Hill, Tex.Civ.App, 271 S.W. 281.

able freight.[77] In the absence of special contract or special circumstances which take the case out of the general rule the carrier is not bound to use extraordinary means to forward perishable freight, or shipments of stock.[78] Thus, in the absence of a statute or a special contract obligating it to do so, a carrier of live stock or perishable goods is not obliged to run a special train to transport the shipment,[79] or to send it on the very next train after acceptance,[80] or on any particular train,[81] or even to send it on a fast train.[82]

Nevertheless it has been held that a railroad must transport live stock as expeditiously as possible.[83]

Speed statutes. It is within the power of the legislature to impose requirements as to speed in transporting shipments of live stock provided the statute enacted is a reasonable exercise of such power.[84] It has been held that a state statute requiring a common carrier to transport live stock from the initial point of shipment to destination at an average speed of not less than ten miles per hour is unconstitutional in rugged mountainous territory during certain of the autumn and winter months as constituting an unreasonable exercise of police power, such speed not being consistent with safety.[85] A statute requiring the safe and speedy transportation of property requires that the shipment be transported in a reasonable time and not merely that the carrier use reasonable care to transport within a reasonable time.[86] A statutory provision requiring common carriers to move live stock at the highest practica-

To markets or to pasture

Under Vernon's Sayles Civ.St Annot.1914 art 6687, it is the duty of a railroad company to furnish cars and transport live stock within a reasonable time to any point on its line, whether the shipment is to a general market, or to a special marble speed consistent with safety and the general movement of its traffic is to be construed in connection with the provisions following it which give a board of commissioners authority to investigate and regulate such shipments and to establish speed schedules therefor and a provision for the enforcement of its orders or rulings.[87]

Delay by agent. Where a carrier undertakes the transportation and delivery of goods at a certain point and employs a switching company as its agent to make the delivery, the switching company is its agent for whose negligent and unreasonable delay it is liable to the shipper for the loss occasioned thereby.[88]

Sunday. Even though a carrier has the right to stop running its trains on Sunday, yet if it failed to do so and undertook to forward freight it must be held to reasonable diligence in doing so.[89]

b. In Time for Particular Market

A carrier will not ordinarily be liable for failure to deliver a shipment to a particular market.

Ordinarily a carrier cannot be held liable for failure to deliver a shipment at its destination in time for a particular market in the absence of a valid special contract therefor.[90] Nevertheless, if there is an unreasonable delay caused by the carrier which deprives the shipper of the benefit of the market on a certain day necessitating a sale on a declining market, the shipper has a cause of action,[91] and, as shown infra § 221 b, the loss of the market may be considered in estimating his damages. Where a live-stock or perishable shipment is carried under a contract providing that the carrier is not bound to transport it in time for any particular market or otherwise than with reasonable dispatch, the fact that it fails to reach a particular market for which it was intended does not render the carrier liable therefor;[92] but the carrier may be liable under such provision if there was an unreasonable delay.[93]

§ 192. Effect of Statute Providing Penalty for Delay

The carrier's common-law duty to transport within a reasonable time is unaffected by statutory penalties for failure to transport within a given time.

Statutes which subject carriers to a penalty for failure to transport goods within a designated time do not in any way affect the carrier's common-law duty to transport within a reasonable time nor its consequent common-law liability for failure to perform such duty, and they have no application to an action to enforce such liability.[94]

No arbitrary power in carrier to fix schedule

§ 193. Rule as Affected by Special Contract

A carrier contracting specially to deliver within a certain time is liable for failure to perform his contract.

Where a carrier makes an express contract to carry and deliver goods within a specified time, it is bound to fulfill its obligation and the fact that it exercised diligence or that it would not be liable as a common carrier in the absence of the contract is immaterial.[95] Whether or not there has been such an undertaking on the part of the carrier is to be determined from the circumstances surrounding the case and by the application of the ordinary rules for the interpretation of contracts.[96] Where the contract provides that the shipment is not to be made within any specified time nor for any particular market, the carrier is liable only for unreasonable delay.[97] The use of the words "reasonable dispatch" in the bill of lading does not cast upon the carrier any greater burden than would have rested on it had the words been omitted.[98] In any event, although a carrier agrees to deliver goods within a specified time, it does not become an absolute insurer of the goods under obligation to deliver at all events or to pay for the property, and, if the goods are destroyed by an act of God or the public enemy before the time for delivering them has expired, this will excuse the carrier on the special contract.[99] The parties are presumed to contract with reference to the responsibility which the common law imposes on the carrier in ordinary cases, the carrier assuming the risk with respect to the time, and this is the limit of the liability assumed by the special agreement.[1]

Oral contract. Where a carrier undertakes the transportation of goods upon an oral agreement, and no bill of lading is issued, such carrier may be liable for negligence resulting in the delay and consequent damage to the goods.[2]

d. Schedule time

a. In General

What constitutes a reasonable time for transportation depends largely on the nature of the shipment and other surrounding circumstances.

What is a reasonable time is not susceptible of being defined by any general rule, but the circumstances of each particular case must be adverted to in order to determine what is a reasonable time in that case;[3] this rule stated in Corpus Juris has often been quoted and cited with approval.[4] The mode of conveyance, the distance, the season of the year, the character of the weather, the ordinary facilities for transportation, and the volume of traffic are to be considered in determining whether in the particular case there has been an unreasonable delay.[5] So also in determining what is a reasonable time for transportation the character of the freight shipped is a very important consideration; it is obvious that what would be a reasonable time for the transportation of one kind of freight would not be for another kind.[6]

Delay itself does not constitute unreasonable delay; if the carrier can show that it was free from any negligence which contributed to the delay, the delay, however long, cannot be said to be unreasonable.[7] Furthermore, the mere fact that the time occupied in the transportation or delivery of the consignment is unusual is not of itself conclusive of unnecessary delay, unless it is so long as clearly to compel a conviction that it was longer than was necessary; it must be so unusual as to be more reasonably attributable to the negligence of the carrier than to any of the causes of delay to which the transportation by reason of the mode, time, route, speed of carriage, or other circumstances implying negligence is known to be exposed,[8] and this rule stated in Corpus Juris has been quoted with approval.[9] On the other hand, proof of delivery in the usual time according to the custom and the course of the company's business is held to be prima facie evidence of reasonable time.[10]

What is a reasonable time is not a time contingent upon the possible existence of unusual conditions not shown to exist.[11]

Applications of the foregoing rules have been made in cases of delays of one year,[12] seventy days,[13] thirty-four days,[14] thirty days,[15] seventeen days,[16] twelve or fifteen days,[17] eight days,[18] sixty-two hours,[19] twenty-four hours,[20] twenty-one hours,[21] and four and one-half hours.[22] placed on what constitutes a reasonable time for transportation after acceptance of goods for shipment.[23]

b. Perishables

The perishability of the freight, the weather, and similar circumstances affecting its spoilage are to be weighed in determining the reasonableness of the time.

As shown supra § 191 a, in so far as its liability for delay is concerned a carrier of perishable freight is only obliged to transport it diligently and without unreasonable delay. Nevertheless the perishability of the shipment is an important circumstance to be considered in determining whether or not a delay is unreasonable.[24] Likewise the season of the year and the prevailing weather conditions, as these circumstances affect the perishability of the shipment, are to be weighed in determining the reasonableness of the time consumed.[25] Accordingly some cases hold that, where the goods are perishable or peculiarly liable to injury from delay, the carrier is bound to use more expedition than where ordinary freight is being carried, and the reasonable time in such instances is a shorter period than in other cases owing to the special circumstances known to the parties at the time the undertaking was entered into.[26] It has also been said that where the freight shipped is perishable it is the duty of the carrier to forward it by its earliest scheduled opportunity or by the earliest train it makes up in the course of its business.[27] There is, however, no absolute duty in every case to ship goods immediately on receipt of them merely because they are perishable, conceding that such freight should generally be given a preference, the demands of the carrier's business, time for regular departure of trains, contracts and obligations already incurred, and other like considerations ought to be regarded in determining whether in any case the carrier has been properly diligent in forwarding the goods after the receipt thereof.[28]

Where a carrier attempted to institute a two-day schedule for perishables between certain points but abandoned it and at a meeting with shipper's representatives a three-day schedule was adopted, a shipper not relying on any representation by the carrier that there would be a two-day schedule is bound by the three-day delivery as announced.[29]

c. Live Stock

The reasonable time for transporting live stock ordinarily contemplates greater dispatch than is necessary for dead freight.

The general rules as to what constitutes a reasonable time for transportation of freight, supra § 194 a, b, apply to delays in shipments of live stock.[30] A carrier accepting a shipment of live stock is chargeable with notice that such freight is highly perishable and that any delay in transporting it may result in damage.[31] The reasonable time required

As facts are known to carrier

What is reasonable time for carrier to transport shipment of animals depends upon facts surrounding each particular shipment as they are known to the carrier.—Elliott v. Chicago M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 161 N.W. 347, 38 S.D. 371.

Removal of dead cow

The stopping of car with cattle at station when there was no other train leaving in nineteen hours, for purpose of removing dead cow, instead of allowing car to go on to another city in same state and have dead cow removed there, constitut-

for the carriage and delivery of a shipment of live stock will ordinarily contemplate a greater dispatch than will the carriage of inanimate or nonperishable freight.[32]

Proper considerations in the determination of what will constitute a reasonable time in this connection may well include the number of animals in the shipment, the general movement of such freight from the particular territory involved and such movement over defendants' line, the volume of the general traffic, and defendants' available equipment.[33]

d. Schedule Time

Transportation within the carrier's regular reasonable schedule is held to be "within a reasonable time" although it is held not to be conclusive of the question.

A carrier may arrange such reasonable schedules for its trains in the carriage of freight as may be proper to the ordinary and economical conduct of its business[34] although the nature and perishability of the freight must be considered,[35] and in the absence of special contract or special circumstances taking the case out of the rule a shipper will be considered to have contemplated and consented to the carrier's ordinary schedule;[36] and hence, if he desires special service, he should contract for it.[37] Thus it is stated as a rule that unless a carrier has undertaken to furnish special service he is not chargeable with negligent or unreasonable delay where he transports a shipment in accordance with his established and published schedules.[38] Nevertheless it has frequently been held that transportation within the carrier's schedule, while an important consideration, is not conclusive on the question of whether the transportation was accomplished within a reasonable time since the schedule may have been unreasonably slow;[39] nor is the carrier's schedule conclusive as to the usual time in which the carrier customarily carried goods of the same kind between the initial and terminal points.[40] It has been held to be no excuse that the carrier maintained a schedule which resulted in delay[41] or that its regular schedule prevented delivery within a reasonable time.[42]

A carrier is not an insurer of the arrival of its

ed unreasonable delay, rendering railroad liable for damage to cattle caused by delay, where railroad through its agents knew that prompt delivery of shipment was essential. The railroad could not escape liability therefor on ground that law required carrier to feed cattle at end of thirty six hours and time required for shipment was more than thirty six hours, where only purpose of stopping car at station was to remove dead cow, and delay required feeding, and cattle would have arrived at destination within 34 hours but for such stop.—Nashville, C. & St. L Ry. v. trains on schedule, even in the transportation of live stock.[43] Where a perishable shipment is carried under a contract providing that the carrier is not bound to transport it otherwise than with reasonable dispatch, the fact that it failed to reach its destination in the time indicated by the schedule is insufficient to render the carrier liable.[44]

§ 195. What Constitutes Negligence

What constitutes diligence or negligence on the part of the carrier depends largely on the circumstances of the particular case.

What constitutes reasonable diligence must depend on the circumstances of each case,[45] one important circumstance being the character of the shipment, which may indicate to the carrier the necessity of a more expeditious transportation, as, for example, perishable goods[46] or a corpse.[47] Mere lapse of time[48] or delay[49] does not of itself establish negligence.

A carrier is guilty of negligence where it accepts property for shipment when it knows or ought to know that it will be unable to transport it in a reasonable time.[50] The carrier will also be liable if the delay results from a wreck due to its negligence,[51] or if the delay is due to the overloading of the engine,[52] or if it carelessly carries goods beyond the destination specified by the shipper.[53] Negligence in ascertaining the location of the place to which the goods are to be transported may render the carrier liable for a consequent delay;[54] but, on the other hand, if some inquiry and exercise of judgment are required to ascertain whether goods are to be transported on a particular train or to a particular destination, delay resulting from the making of proper inquiry and exercise of proper discretion will not constitute negligence.[55]

Failure to delay a regular freight train in order to handle a shipment of cattle is not negligence;[56] nor is a carrier required to hold a train to permit a shipper to complete his loading after the train arrives.[57]

In general, the selection of a route, where more than one route is available to the carrier, will not render it liable if reasonable care is exercised in this respect, and especially is this true where by reason of some obstruction in the usual route, not due to the carrier's negligence, it becomes necessary to exercise judgment as to forwarding by another route.[58] It has been held, however, that where perishable goods could have been brought to destination in time for their marketing by transferring the shipment at an intermediate point to another train, failure to make such transfer is negligence rendering the carrier liable for the spoiling of the goods owing to the delay in shipment.[59] In such case, the carrier should employ the most direct route.[60]

A carrier may be liable for loss due to an unreasonable delay which was proximately caused by the carrier's negligence in failing to inspect the freight tendered prior to issuing a bill of lading and accepting such goods as in apparent good order, where they were palpably improperly loaded and where such patent defect, if discovered, could have been remedied and the subsequent delay avoided.[61]

A delay caused by the carrier's negligence in permitting the goods to be stolen while in transit is a negligent delay for which the carrier is liable.[62]

Live stock. While, as shown supra § 191 a, a carrier which has not bound itself to do so need not transport a live stock shipment on any particular train, nevertheless, having started the shipment, it may not willfully delay it by cutting the car out of a train and sending it on a train which would arrive much later.[63] A carrier is liable to the shipper for the ensuing damages where it refuses or neglects to unload when such is its duty,[64] or where it negligently refuses[65] or unreasonably delays[66] in picking up the car containing the shipment. It has been held that a delay of twelve hours in transportation of live stock, caused by holding the cattle on account of the sickness and death of one, does not constitute negligence, where the remaining cattle are sent forward by the next train.[67]

A carrier of live stock is liable for all damage that is referable to the negligent prolongation of the transportation, through its natural effect on the physical condition or latent vicious propensities of the animals, whereby they are reduced in strength or weight more than they would have been had prompt carriage and delivery been made.[68]

Express company. Where defendant express company, although a common carrier, does not own the railroad lines over which it does business, the fact that a railroad detached the cars containing the shipment from a fast train not scheduled to stop at the destination of the shipment, and left them on a siding from which they were carried to their destination by the next train making a stop at such destination, does not make the express company liable as for negligent delay.[69]

§ 196. Delay as Proximate Cause of Injury

The delay for which damages are sought must be the proximate cause of the loss or injury complained of.

Where damages are sought to be recovered on the ground of delay in shipment, the delay must be the proximate cause of the loss or the injury complained of.[70] According to the weight of authority, the rule is that, if the loss or the injury complained of would have occurred notwithstanding the goods had been shipped in a reasonable time, the carrier is not liable;[71] and that, if the subsequent loss of the goods is due to an independent cause, the carrier will not be liable, although it has been guilty of a negligent delay in transportation.[72] If, however, the negligent delay occasions the ultimate injury which results from the goods not reaching their destination in time, the carrier

Goods stolen and held

Where a fur delivered to a carrier for shipment was stolen while in transit by an employee of the carrier, due to the negligence of the carrier, and later recovered by federal officials and retained by them as evidence in prosecuting the employee, the carrier was liable for the delay in delivery, the retention of the goods by the officers being a proximate result of carrier's negligence; hence there was no error in refusing an instruction that, if the fur was held by the federal officials, to be used as evidence in the case against the employee, defendant would not be liable.—American Ry Express Co. v. is liable,[73] and this is so, although the loss does not directly result while the goods are in its possession.[74]

If the carrier's negligent delays in getting its train to its destination contributed proximately with delays which were not negligent, the carrier is liable.[75] Likewise, the carrier is liable for injuries to which its negligent delay contributes, although its conduct may not have been the sole cause of the injury.[76] Accordingly, it will be liable even if the concurrent negligence of another carrier,[77] or the inherent propensity of the animals being transported,[78] contributes to the loss. A cause cannot be concurrent with a proximate cause and be remote at the same time.[79]

Excuses which would have been good for a delay had there been no negligence on the part of the carrier will not be available where the injury results from negligence.[80] Where there has been delay, even though excusable, the carrier must take reasonable precautions to avoid injury resulting therefrom.[81] The carrier should notify the consignee of the delay if thereby resulting injury may be avoided.[82]

It is the rule in some jurisdictions that a delay at one point will not be regarded as the proximate cause of another delay due to an act of God which the shipment would have escaped had the first delay not occurred.[83] It has also been held that if the carrier's negligence mingled with the act of God in causing the delay, the carrier would be liable for the loss resulting from the delay.[84]

Where part of a shipment becomes delayed because of necessary repairs to the cars and the shipper refuses the carrier's offer to forward the rest of the shipment immediately, he may not recover for the additional delay of the residue of the shipment for which immediate transportation was offered.[85]

§ 197. Excuses for Delay

Any facts which the law recognizes as an excuse for a delay will constitute a good defense

Where damages are sought on the ground that the carrier has breached its common-law undertaking to transport with reasonable diligence, any facts which the law recognizes as an excuse for delay will constitute a good defense, although no exemption from liability on any such ground was in the contract of shipment.[86] Generally speaking, any delay due to such an occurrence as could not have been anticipated in the exercise by the carrier of reasonable prudence, diligence, and care is excusable.[87]

§ 198. Acts of Shipper

The carrier is not liable for a delay caused by the act or fault of the shipper.

If the delay is due to the act or fault of the shipper, the carrier cannot be held accountable for resulting injury.[88] Thus, for example, where the delay is due to the fact that the shipper misdirected the goods the carrier is not liable.[89] Nevertheless, where after misdirecting the shipment, the shipper gives proper directions to the carrier, thereby creating a new contract, the carrier is liable for an unreasonable delay subsequently occurring.[90]

It has been held that if, notwithstanding the fault of the shipper, the carrier is guilty of some negligent act or omission without which the loss would not have occurred it will be liable.[91] The fact that a shipper was negligent in delaying the ordering of goods before he delivered them to a carrier for transportation, and that he had already sustained damages because of his delay, will not prevent him from recovering the damages arising from the negligence of the carrier in delaying such transportation, if such damages can be shown with reasonable certainty to have resulted therefrom.[92] Neglect of the consignee to unload perishable goods as soon as practicable will not excuse the carrier for decay caused by delay, if it appears that the loss had already occurred before arrival at destination.[93] It is not the law, however, that, if there is a delay causing some injury to the shipment at its destination, the carrier is responsible for the full damages, even though some of the damages resulted from the independent acts of the shipper.[94]

Knowledge by shipper's agent. The fact that an agent of the shipper knew that the carrier negligently placed a shipment of animals on a siding which was improperly ventilated and did not complain does not establish contributory negligence, in the absence of a showing that such agent knew that the car would remain there a considerable time, or that the agent was authorized to request their removal or that the carrier would have heeded such a request if made.[95]

Diversion or reshipment. Where live stock are shipped to one point with privilege of another destination and, at the shipper's request, are unloaded at the latter and again reshipped to the original destination, the carrier is not liable for the delay and shrinkage at the intermediate point.[96] Where goods have been shipped within a state consigned by the shipper to himself and, on arrival at their destination, the shipper-consignee does not receive them, as he could do, but orders them delivered to another carrier for further transportation, the

Express company

(1) Independent of statute, when a delay by an express company in delivering goods results solely from shipper's misdirection, the loss falls on the shipper whose careless conduct caused it.—American Ry. Express Co. v. Ewing Thomas Converting Co., C.C.A.Pa., 292 F. 335.

(2) An express company is not liable for delay in delivering an express package to a consignee, where the wrong address was given, and evidence is produced at the trial to show that the company made efforts to deliver the package, and had informed the consignor that it could not find the consignee at the address given. The express company fulfills its duty where it delivers the property intrusted to its care at the address given, and, when it cannot find the consignee, notifies the shipper of such fact, and it is not to blame for failure to get from other sources the information, in regard to the address, which the consignor should have supplied—Fineberg v American Express Co., 71 Pa.Super 407.

liability of the first carrier has been determined, so that it is not liable for damages due to delay in delivery by the terminal carrier.[97] A carrier which diverts a shipment as ordered by the consignor and ignores a subsequent notice by the consignee, having no knowledge that the latter is agent of the former, is not liable for the delay caused thereby, which is attributable to the consignor's neglect to notify the carrier of the agency.[98]

§ 199. Advising Shipper as to Probable Delay

A carrier must advise the shipper of any circumstance likely to cause delay of which it knows or should know.

Where goods are tendered to a carrier for transportation, it is bound to advise the shipper as to any cause likely to delay transportation, which cause is within its knowledge, or within its fair and reasonable means of knowledge, and not within the knowledge of the shipper; and, if it fails in its duty in this respect, a delay in the transportation of the goods will not be excused, and that, too, irrespective of the nature of the cause.[1] The

Acts of God

If a carrier accepts goods for shipment with full knowledge of floods and washouts on its line and the lines of connecting carriers, it should notify the shipper of the same, or stipulate against the consequences, and if it fails to do so it should not be heard to offer as an excuse that delay in shipment was caused by an act of God.

Congestion of traffic or press of business

(1) Where a carrier receives freight for transportation, unusual press of business or congestion of traffic will not excuse delay unless the shipper was notified at the time the shipment was received of such congestion.

(2) A carrier should notify a shipper of stock of a crowded and congested condition at a connecting point which would cause delay in shipments, and, failing to do so, such congested condition would be no excuse for delay in shipment.—Ft. Worth & R. G. Ry. Co. v Hasse, Tex Civ.App., 226 S.W. 448
10 C.J. p 291 note 71 [b], [c], [d].

Embargo

(1) Where a carrier has accepted shipment of live stock with knowledge of an embargo on live stock shipments by a connecting carrier whereby it might become impossible to fulfill its contract of carriage, which the shipper did not know, and of which the carrier did not give him notice, it could not interpose such embargo as a defense to an action for delay and diversion of ship-

acceptance of goods for shipment without notifying the shipper of the fact that they cannot be promptly delivered is tantamount to an assurance that they will be delivered within a reasonable time, except for the intervening of excusing causes of subsequent occurrence.[2] This duty is in no way dependent on special agreement, but is a part of the duty imposed by law on carriers;[3] and the reason why the law has imposed it on the carrier is to give the shipper an opportunity to exercise his own discretion as to the propriety of making the shipment—to choose between the different courses open to him.[4] Thus, where a carrier receives goods under such circumstances without notice to the shipper of probable delay and fails to obtain his consent, express or implied, it is bound to transport the goods within a reasonable time, notwithstanding the emergency.[5]

When the carrier has complied with its duty in respect of giving notice, it should not be held responsible for a delay which it cannot prevent if the shipper still insists on delivering his property for shipment,[6] and an express agreement between the carrier and the shipper is not necessary to exempt the carrier from liability for delay in delivery due to such conditions.[7] However, any notice given can in no case operate further than the plain scope thereof.[8]

Cause not likely to interfere with transportation. A carrier is not bound to advise the shipper of a possible cause of delay which, in reasonable anticipation, will not interfere with the carrier's business.[9]

Independent knowledge by shipper. From the general rule heretofore stated, it seems that the duty to notify the shipper of circumstances likely to cause delay is obligatory only when such matters are not within the knowledge of the shipper. It is, however, the rule, in some jurisdictions at least, that public knowledge does not relieve the carrier of the duty to give actual notice to the shipper of conditions that may cause delay in delivery;[10] and that even actual knowledge by the shipper of the conditions will not excuse the carrier where the latter knowingly continues to receive shipments without a notification that the goods

(2) Carrier, knowing possibility of delayed shipments and not advising shipper, cannot defend because car might have been delayed for war embargoes—Powell-Meyers Lumber Co. v. Tremont & Gulf Ry. Co., 2 La. App. 164.

Quarantine

Carrier accepting manure for shipment through area in which state quarantine regulations, known to it but unknown to shipper, prevented movement in open cars, was liable to shipper for value of manure, where shipper was not informed of regulations and shipment was detained and later sold—Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. South Georgia Milling Co., 161 S.E. 282, 44 Ga. App. 316.

Water shortage and traffic congestion, not called to the attention of the shipper, did not justify carrier not notifying shipper thereof in failing to comply with its statutory duty to transport cattle "within reasonable time to destination."—Texas & P. Ry. Co. v. Bufkin, Tex. Civ. App., 46 S.W.2d 712, error dismissed.

Conductor's knowledge of probable delay

M., the conductor knew that there would be delays preventing the train from reaching the stockyards in time for the market at 8 o'clock A. M., it was negligence for the carrier to fail to notify the shipper, loading his cattle at that point, of that fact—Holland v. Hines, Mo. App., 234 S.W. 366.

Subsequent embargo

The fact that the carrier laid an embargo on shipments of onions after a congestion had occurred cannot as a matter of law excuse him from liability for accepting prior to embargo shipments which could not be handled without delay—Meany & Saisselin v. Erie R. Co., 173 N.Y.S. 96.

are accepted subject to delay.[11] In any event, where the shipper is well aware of the existence of circumstances rendering a delay probable and admittedly makes the shipment to take advantage of the higher prices caused thereby, he cannot recover for the delay.[12]

Notice to third person. Notice to a third person is not notice to the shipper or consignee, in the absence of a contract provision to that effect.[13] Where goods are shipped to a consignee with directions to notify a third person, the carrier is under no duty to notify such third person of a strike of railway employees at the point of destination.[14]

Express shipments. The general rule of the duty of the carrier to notify the shipper of probable delay has been held to apply to express companies.[15] However, it has been held that, where it is not shown and cannot reasonably be presumed that the shipper had no knowledge of any cause which might delay transportation, if the shipper does not possess all of the information he desires as to causes which might delay the delivery of the goods, it is more reasonable that he should inquire than that the express company carrier or its agents are in duty bound to state such circumstances.[16]

Shipments to foreign countries. The general principles stated in this section may to some extent be relaxed with reference to shipments to foreign countries, in which case the shipper is presumed to know that the point of destination lies within a foreign country. It is the shipper's duty in such case to acquaint himself with the laws of the foreign country governing the delivery of freight.[17]

§ 200. Press of Business, or Lack of Facilities

A carrier can excuse itself for delay on account of unusual press of business or lack of facilities only by showing that its facilities on hand were adequate to handle ordinary business with reasonable dispatch.

If the carrier has a reasonable equipment for all ordinary purposes, and the delay is occasioned by an unusual press of business, but the carrying is done with reasonable expedition under the circumstances, then it is not responsible for the delay.[18] Thus, if at the time of making a contract of shipment of freight a carrier has no doubt, and the condition of business on its line gives it no reason to doubt, that suitable facilities will be at its command to transport the shipment to its destination within the usual and ordinary time, taking into consideration the necessary care of the property en route, and a delay is occasioned by an extraordinary and unusual influx of freight on its line subsequent to the making of the contract, so that delivery, with proper diligence on its part, within a reasonable time, is thereby rendered impossible, the carrier is not liable for the consequent delay.[19] If, however, at the time the contract is made there is already an accumulation of business on the carrier's line which incapacitates it, or might reasonably be expected to incapacitate it from transporting and delivering the shipment within a reasonable time, and this is then known to the carrier, or might have been known with proper effort on its part,[20] or if there are then reasonable grounds for belief on the part of the carrier that such is the case at the time, then the carrier is liable for the delay, although it is occasioned by the accumulation of business,[21] at least, as shown supra § 199, in the absence of notification to, or knowledge of the condition by, the shipper.

The carrier can excuse itself for delay on account of unusual press of business or lack of facilities only by showing that the facilities it had available were sufficient to handle the usual volume of business with reasonable dispatch,[22] and by showing that it has made the best practicable use of its means of transportation.[23] A delay due to a shortage of cars is not excused by the acts or inefficiency of the carrier's agent employed to trace and return its cars to it from other lines.[24]

In general freight received is to be forwarded without discrimination, and a delay of one shipment on account of other shipments subsequently received is not excusable,[25] although it has been held that the carrier may give precedence to perishable freight as against that which will not suffer special injury on account of reasonable delay,[26] and to relief goods sent to sufferers from some calamity;[27] and the rule requiring the carrier to haul freight of the same kind in the order of its tender for shipment applies only to the station at which the freight is offered.[28] Delay of a shipment is not excused by the congestion of the carrier's terminal or unloading tracks due to its delay in unloading or moving the cars thereon,[29] nor

Where a bill of lading provided for storage of property shipped if not removed by the consignee within a certain period, a contention of the carrier, in a suit by the consignee for delay, that such delay was caused by the congested condition of the terminal tracks due to the failure of consignee to remove the goods which arrived, would not excuse the carrier's delay.—Warren is a delay in delivering perishables excused by a congestion caused by the filling of defendant's tracks with cars held for demurrage charges.[30]

Special equipment. A carrier is not bound to furnish a special engine for a train which would otherwise be overloaded by the taking of the goods offered.[31]

§ 201. Weather Conditions

Extreme weather conditions are usually a sufficient excuse for delay.

Extraordinary weather conditions, such as floods, snowstorms, and the like, will ordinarily constitute a sufficient excuse for delay in transportation,[32] even though such conditions or disturbances do not constitute acts of God;[33] and the carrier is not bound to divert the goods from its own to another route over which it has no control, unless in the exercise of a sound discretion it appears that the change of route would probably have prevented the loss from delay without incurring other dangers.[34] It is bound, however, to use reasonable care to avoid delay,[35] and should make reasonable provision for operating its trains in all kinds of weather, such as is expected in the particular latitude where its business is carried on.[36]

Where a carrier negligently delays the shipment of a perishable commodity at a season when it is reasonable to anticipate that a delay will subject the commodity to a temperature that is apt to destroy it and where such result actually follows, the loss results from the negligent delay for which the carrier is liable.[37]

Although there is a delay or interruption in the transportation due to an excepted cause, yet for loss subsequently occurring by reason of an independent cause the carrier will be liable.[38] It is, however, only the negligence of the carrier in not avoiding the threatened loss which will thus render it liable.[39]

§ 202. Strikes and Mobs

A peaceable strike of the carrier's employees will not, as a rule, excuse it from its duty to transport with reasonable dispatch, but violent strikes or mob interference may constitute such an excuse.

As is stated in Corpus Juris which has been quoted and cited as authority for the rule,[40] a carrier is liable for the negligent or wrongful acts of its servants during the course of their employment, and, therefore, as a general rule if its employees go on a strike, abandoning the performance of their duties and causing delay in the transportation of goods in their charge or control, the carrier is liable in the absence of a stipulation to the contrary, the delay being due to the employees' wrongful acts.[41] If the strikers cease to be servants of

Acceptance during peaceable strike
In action for delay in delivery of the carrier, the latter, while no longer responsible for their acts, will be liable if it fails to exercise reasonable diligence in counteracting the effects of the strike,[42] and it has been held that, after the employees have quit the carrier's employment, it is its duty promptly to supply their places, if practicable.[43]

A limitation to this general rule of liability for delay due to strikes may arise where the prospective shipper has been notified by the carrier of the existence of a strike or of an anticipated strike, as discussed supra § 199.

Still another, and an important, limitation on the carrier's liability for delay caused by strikes is that the carrier will not be liable for such delay if the strike or refusal of its employees to work is accompanied by violent interference with the carrier's business.[44] If the strikers, after having abandoned the service of the carrier, proceed by lawless violence to obstruct the movement of its trains, an entirely different situation is presented and the delay thereby occasioned is excusable[45] whether the persons guilty of the lawless violence are considered to be its own employees who have abandoned its service,[46] or are deemed to be mere rioters no longer in the carrier's employ.[47] Indeed, if by any mob violence the carrier is prevented from performing its obligation to transport goods in its charge or control, it will be excused for resulting delay;[48] thus a carrier is not liable for delay due to a riot not engaged in by its employees, which riot renders the running of trains unsafe or impossible.[49] The only duty resting on the carrier not otherwise in fault is to use reasonable efforts and due diligence to overcome obstacles thus interposed and to forward the goods to their destination,[50] but this duty is one which it is bound to observe.[51]

One jurisdiction follows what appears to be a somewhat different rule which, while recognizing the carrier's duty to exercise reasonable diligence in averting strikes and saving its patrons from strike losses and minimizing the injurious consequences of such interference, holds that the carrier is not liable if it complies with such duty and its service is delayed by persons who, by striking, have ceased to be its employees, provided the carrier informs the shipper of the situation and keeps him so informed.[52]

§ 203. Accident

Accidents, even though not inevitable or amounting to acts of God, may excuse a delay.

The shipper assumes the risk of unavoidable ac-

Due diligence exercised

Where a terminal carrier which owned and operated wharves and a connecting line of railroad, by reason of a strike of longshoremen, failed from August 27 to September 10 to discharge a cargo of coal tendered it, but had endeavored to the best of its ability to continue operation of its facilities by trying to come to terms with the strikers, and by employment of strike breakers, and by doing all in its power to procure an opportunity to discharge the vessel at some other dock, it was held that it exercised reasonable diligence, and discharged the ship in a reasonable time in view of the unusual conditions—Warren v. Portland Terminal Co, 116 A. 411, 121 Me 157, 26 A L. R 304

Reemployment of discharged workman unnecessary

It cannot be said that a terminal carrier operating wharves and a connecting line of railroad was lacking in diligence in discharging coal from a ship, in that it could, but would not, stop a strike of longshoremen by reemploying a man justifiably discharged for insolence and insubordination—Warren v. Portland Terminal Co 116 A. 411, 121 Me. 157, 26 A. L.R. 304.

cidents.[53] Furthermore, as was stated in Corpus Juris which has been quoted and cited as authority for the proposition,[54] a carrier may excuse delay in the delivery of the goods caused by accident or misfortune which is not inevitable nor produced by the act of God or the public enemy.[55] In this respect the carrier occupies the same position as do other bailees.[56] All that can be required of it in any emergency is that it shall exercise due care and diligence to guard against delay and to forward the goods to their destination.[57] This rule is, of course, limited by the general duty of the carrier to exercise reasonable diligence to transport shipments with reasonable dispatch, see supra § 191. Thus the fact that a delay is caused by an accident to the carrier's engine furnishes no excuse for delay, where there were other engines available to move the cars.[58]

§ 204. Compliance with Law

A delay made necessary by compliance with the law is generally excusable.

As a general rule a carrier not otherwise negligent is not liable for a delay which is necessary to avoid a violation of law.[59] This rule has been held inapplicable where the delay is in obedience to an unconstitutional statute which, it is said, can be regarded neither as imposing obligations nor as affording protection;[60] neither is the rule applicable to a compliance with a board of health order forbidding the entrance of the shipment at its place of destination, where the carrier had stopped the shipment before the order was issued and where such order was canceled the very day of its issue.[61]

Animal health and quarantine regulations. Where cattle are delayed by a quarantine imposed by the public authorities in the exercise of police power, such delay and the resulting injury to the cattle cannot be charged as negligence against the carrier in possession thereof.[62] A carrier cannot be held liable for damages resulting from a delay in delivery due to the mistake of a government inspector in quarantining a live stock shipment where there was no fraud or collusion on its part.[63]

A shipper of live stock in interstate commerce under a state certificate insufficient to permit the stock to be put in pens certified by federal inspectors cannot complain of the delay caused by the carrier's failure to have a federal permit, where the duty is on the shipper as well as the carrier to have such permit.[64]

Where a carrier accepts a breeding animal for shipment into a state under a veterinarian's certificate of soundness required by such state, it cannot delay the shipment of the animal because it entertains doubt as to the sufficiency of its certificate, the state authorities not having objected to its sufficiency.[65]

Maximum working hours. Compliance with a statute prohibiting the working of train crews more than a specified number of hours will not necessarily excuse a delay as reasonable, since it is presumed that a railroad carrier has more than one crew available and that one is resting while another is working.[66]

Unloading and feeding regulations. A carrier is excused from liability for a delay due to a compliance with state or federal legislation requiring carriers to unload cattle for food, water, and rest,[67] unless the cattle were held at the point where they were unloaded for an unreasonable length of time.[68] Where, however, a delay at a point where the carrier is required by law to unload a live-stock shipment was occasioned by the negligent delay of the carrier at a previous point, the carrier is liable for damages occasioned by the delay at the point where he was required to unload.[69] The test of the necessity of a delay for unloading stock at a rest and feeding stop is said to be whether or not the carrier is at fault in believing that it would be unable to deliver the shipment at its destination within the period prescribed by law for rest stops.[70]

Clearance. It has been held that, where a carrier agreed to deliver imported goods in bond to the consignee at an internal port of entry, it was liable for losses sustained while the goods were detained in a warehouse in the original port of entry, because of the carrier's failure to prepare and file the necessary clearance papers.[71] It has also been held, however, that where a delay of a shipment into the United States is occasioned by the failure of the shipper to obtain clearance papers the carrier is not liable therefor, since it is not obliged to perform such special service unless it contracts to do so.[72]

§ 205. · Custom or Usage

A delay due to the operation of a custom long established and well known is excusable.

Where a custom as to the transportation of freight has been long established and is well known, the parties are supposed silently to adopt it as a part of the contract, unless it conflicts with its express terms, and a delay occasioned by the operation of such custom will not render the carrier liable therefor.[73]

Custom and usage generally see C.J.S. title Customs and Usages.

§ 206. · Other Excuses for Delay

Other matters or circumstances have been considered by the courts as constituting or as not constituting valid excuses for delay, such as, inter alia, delays incidental to railroading, defects and repairs, and interference by third persons.

It has been held to be no excuse that regular trains of the carrier did not connect in time to avoid delay;[74] or that the carrier knew that its connecting line could not without unreasonable delay forward the goods, it being the duty of the carrier to deliver the goods at the point at which it contracts to deliver within a reasonable time.[75] Likewise, it has been held that a carrier delaying delivery of freight cannot excuse the delay on the ground that the bills of lading were not presented, where it did not decline to deliver because of such fact;[76] that a shipper tendered a check instead of money for freight charges where it appeared that the money, if tendered, would have been refused;[77] that the consignee did not tender the freight charges, where notice was given of the arrival of the goods shipped and demand was made for such charges;[78] that a shipper of live stock refused to comply with a provision of the contract requiring the shipper to accompany and care for them.[79] A carrier cannot excuse delay by reason of an invalid embargo which it has placed on particular classes of freight.[80] It is not a defense to an action for injuries caused by unreasonable delay in transportation that the contract of shipment was void under the Interstate

Shipper's request immaterial

In live stock shipper's action for damages caused by delay in shipment, it was no defense that the shipper requested that the cattle be unloaded at a certain point and that the cattle would have arrived at destination within the required time if cattle had not been unloaded at such point, where the cattle were in the hands of the railroad while unloaded and it was the railroad's duty to unload the cattle at such point under the Federal Twenty-Eight Hour Law, U.S.Comp.St. §§ 8651–8654, and Vernon's Sayles Civ.St.Annot.1914 art. 714, since more than thirty-six hours had elapsed since they were loaded, the shipper's request in such case being merely a reminder to the railroad of its statutory duty.—Lancaster v. Commerce Act as discriminating in favor of the shipper by giving him too low a rate, although there can be no recovery on the contract.[81]

Incidental delays in general. The fact that a carrier takes a reasonable time to perform the ordinary and incidental acts required for efficient and safe railroading will not render it liable, as for unreasonable delay, for the time consumed thereby; the shipper is considered to have contemplated such incidental delays when he entered into the contract of carriage.[82] Nevertheless, such usual incidents to railroading as allowing trains to pass, taking water and fuel, waiting for signals, inspecting the train, waiting for locomotive, lunch for train crew, cutting out helper, loading for other shippers, and the like, are not valid excuses for failing to maintain schedule, as they must be taken into account by the carrier when fixing his schedule.[83]

Defects and repairs. Ordinarily, results attributed to a defective roadbed and equipment afford no excuse for the nonperformance of the duty to deliver a shipment at destination within a reasonable time.[84] While the fact that a defect occurred and was diligently repaired or the defective part replaced within a reasonable time may excuse the carrier from liability for loss due to the delay,[85] nevertheless this fact does not conclusively establish that there was no negligence or that the occurrence was unavoidable, since it is the carrier's duty to maintain its equipment in good order; the carrier should show that the defect which occurred was not known, and that by the exercise of ordinary care in the inspection of its equipment and by prudent operation and management, such defect, be it patent or latent, could not have been discovered and the incidental delay avoided.[86] Usual or ordinary defects or repairs such as hot boxes, removal of brake shoes, or the like, have been held not to be excuses for delay or failure to maintain schedule, since the schedule fixed must necessarily take into account a certain amount of delay due to such causes, and these incidents will not be considered to be unavoidable accidents excusing a delay in the absence of unusual conditions not preventable by

Ordinary conduct of business
In action against defendant express company for delay of shipment of cattle, it was held that, under the particular circumstances, the "ordinary conduct of the carrier's business," the incidental delays of which the shipper is considered to have contemplated, was to transport the shipment by a fast passenger train to a point where some connecting carrier would take it with one of its trains which stopped at the point of destination—Adams Express Co. v. Bad road and bridges
A carrier not shown to be insolvent is liable to a shipper for damages resulting from a drop in prices of forest products tendered and awaiting shipment because of delay in transportation owing to the fact that the road and bridges were being repaired, where the repairs were unnecessarily delayed owing to a lack of money, which the carrier could have procured if it had used due diligence.—Bell Lumber Co v. Replacing wheels
Where a pair of wheels on a car carrying poultry were worn through the chill or tread, due to continuous wear, and not unfair handling, the carrier was not negligent, nor was there unreasonable delay, where the car was taken from the train, new wheels put on, and the car forwarded on the next fast freight, total loss of time being two hours and forty-two minutes.—Fleck & Hillman v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 172 N.Y.S. 129.

the exercise of due care,[87] nevertheless, it has also been held that the development of a hot box may excuse a particular delay if the carrier exercises diligence in caring for it when it does occur.[88]

Facilities for repairs. As regards the question of diligence in delivering a shipment of freight, a railroad carrier is not required to have facilities for repairs to cars, in which the shipment is being transported, all along its line or to keep its shops operating during the nighttime for car repairs.[89]

Interference by third persons. Ordinarily, a carrier is not excused for delay in transporting goods resulting from its compliance with stopping instructions given by a stranger to the bill of lading, who is not the owner of the goods or the agent of the shipper or consignee.[90] Where, however, property is in the hands of a common carrier, and possession thereof is demanded by a stranger to the bill of lading, prior to actual shipment and under a claim of ownership, the carrier, having reasonable doubt as to which party is entitled to possession and acting in good faith, may have a reasonable time within which to investigate the claims of the respective parties, and for this purpose may delay immediate shipment.[91]

Military control of railroad. If a railroad is under military control, the company will not be liable for delay due to such interference,[92] provided, of course, there is some interference.[93] If, however, the probability of delay on such account was known to the company at the time when the goods were received for transportation, it cannot rely on such defense;[94] it should in such case abdicate its functions as a common carrier and refuse to receive goods for transportation.[95]

§ 207. Special Contract as Affecting Excuse for Delay

A carrier specially contracting to deliver a shipment at a fixed time is liable for failing to do so, irrespective of the cause of its failure.

Where the carrier specifically agrees to deliver by a fixed time, it is bound to answer in damages for failure so to do, without regard to the cause of the delay; the general rule of the law of contracts, that the person undertaking to perform must do so at his peril, is applicable; and unavoidable accident, unexpected rush of business, or the like, will not furnish an excuse.[96] It has even been held that the liability of the carrier under such a contract will not be affected by a subsequent stipulation that, if the goods are not delivered within such time, a certain deduction shall be made from the freight charges.[97] Some holdings seem to excuse the carrier from literal performance when unforeseen circumstances, such as the law recognizes, are sufficient to occasion slight delays,[98] but other decisions require the carrier to fulfill its obligation notwithstanding any accident or delay by inevitable necessity, since it might have provided against such contingencies by contract.[99]

Implied contract for fast service. Where a common carrier holds itself out as willing to accept perishables for fast shipment to a certain point, it has the duty to perform as it held out to do, and it is no defense to an action for delay of such goods that they were shipped under an ordinary bill of lading not providing for special service.[1]

Failure to crate goods. Where defendant storage company contracts to pack and ship goods on a certain day, and after deciding what articles require crating also held other articles for that purpose, thereby delaying the shipment which is destroyed by fire in its warehouse, it cannot excuse its failure to ship the goods at the time agreed on, on the ground that plaintiff should have crated the articles.[2]

§ 208. Waiver of Right of Action Arising Out of Delay

A shipper may waive expressly or impliedly the carrier's liability to him for delay.

Generally speaking the shipper may, by express contract, waive the carrier's liability for loss resulting from delay or detention.[3] For a valuable consideration, the shipper may by the contract of shipment release the carrier from damages for its prior negligent delay in providing cars or in loading the shipment.[4] After the goods have been accepted and loaded for shipment, a contract releasing the carrier from liability for delay in forwarding the shipment after it was loaded is void, in the absence of consideration.[5]

Mere acceptance of the goods from the carrier on their arrival will not constitute a waiver of a claim for damages due to delay.[6] A shipper waives his right of action for delay, however, when he insists on a shipment of his goods after being informed of the fact that a delay is probable owing to conditions making a delay likely.[7] Similarly, where traffic over the direct line is impossible due to flood, and a shipper of cattle directs that they be sent by a circuitous and longer route, he cannot complain that the transportation takes more time, or that there is more shrinkage in the shipment on delivery than if they had been sent by the shorter route.[8] A shipper does not waive the right to damages for delay in furnishing a stock car after notice by a provision of a subsequent contract, to the effect that all prior contracts and understandings as to the receipt or transportation of stock or the furnishing of cars are waived by the shipper and merged in the agreement, the right to damages for the delay being based on the carrier's violation of its common-law duty, and not on its breach of contract.[9] An undertaking by the shipper to care for a perishable shipment and keep it in good condition while in transit does not absolve the carrier of its duty to exercise reasonable diligence to avoid delay.[10]

Release. A carrier which contracts to ship perishables to a certain place within a given time but fails even to transport them at all, and insists that the shipper take them back, is not released by reason of the fact that the shipper disposes of them elsewhere to minimize the damages.[11]

§ 209. Actions for Delay

In the following sections are discussed matters relating to right of action, venue, conditions precedent, parties, pleading, evidence, and trial of actions against carriers for damages for delay in transportation.

Actions for loss or injury to property generally see infra §§ 244–274.

§ 210. Right of Action and Defenses

A shipper's cause of action for the carrier's negligent failure to transport within a reasonable time may be in contract or in tort.

When a common carrier has accepted a shipment for transportation and negligently failed to transport it to its destination within a reasonable time, the aggrieved party may bring an action for the breach of a contract of carriage, or he may bring an action for the negligent breach of the duty imposed by law on the carrier.[12] It has been held

Title in shipper

In action by shippers for delay in delivery of cotton sold to a cotton buyer conditioned on delivery within forty-eight hours, title not having passed, the action for damages was that in an action against an express company for negligent delay the liability in contract and the liability in tort is in general the same.[13] It has also been held that a statute providing that all claims or demands arising from unreasonable delay in transportation may be submitted to the public service commission, does not set up an exclusive remedy, but one that is cumulative only.[14] The Carmack amendment does not take away the right of a shipper to maintain an action on the carrier's common-law liability for negligent delay in shipping live stock, even though it be an interstate shipment.[15]

Right of action for loss or injury generally see infra § 245.

Defenses. Matters of defense to an action for damages for negligent or unreasonable delay are considered in those sections dealing with excuses for delay, supra §§ 197–207. Clearly, a showing that there had been no unreasonable delay is a good defense to an action against a carrier for a breach of his common-law duty to deliver within a reasonable time.[16]

Defenses in actions for loss or injury generally see infra § 245.

§ 211. · Jurisdiction and Venue

Venue in cases of this kind is regulated by statute.

The venue in actions of this character is a matter of statutory regulation, see C.J.S. title Venue. It has been held that, where an action against a carrier was properly brought in the county of plaintiff's residence, the fact that plaintiff joined therewith a cause for the statutory penalty for the same delay which did not arise in that county does not require a change of venue.[17] In a suit ex delicto for failure to deliver in a reasonable time, the tort is presumed to have occurred at the point of destination insofar as venue is concerned.[18]

Jurisdiction and venue in actions for loss or injury generally see infra § 246.

§ 212. · Time to Sue and Limitations

See generally title Limitations of Actions. Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 213. · Conditions Precedent

Payment of freight and other charges is not a condition precedent to the action.

The prepayment of freight is not essential to an action for damages for delay[19] unless required by the carrier.[20] Similarly, plaintiff's refusal on the arrival of the goods, to pay the freight, war tax, and demurrage charges, which prevents him from being entitled to immediate possession of the goods, does not preclude him from maintaining an action for damages for delay.[21]

Conditions precedent to actions for loss or injury generally see infra § 247. Notice of claim for damages see infra § 233 et seq.

§ 214. · Parties

The real party in interest, usually the owner, is the proper party plaintiff.

Where goods are intrusted to a carrier for transportation and delivery, the carrier thereby has notice of the interest of both the consignor and the consignee; and, if either suffers an injury through the negligent delay in the transportation or delivery of the goods, the person so suffering such injury may bring an action against the carrier to obtain redress for such injury.[22] The owner of

Absolute ownership unnecessary

"In order to maintain an action against a carrier for the recovery of damages occasioned by negligence in the transportation or delivery of goods, either ex contractu or ex delicto, the plaintiff need not be the absolute owner of the goods. If the plaintiff has a special interest therein and his legal rights have been invaded, that would entitle him to maintain the action."—Florida East Coast Ry. Co. v Peters, 73 So. 151, 72 Fla 311, Ann Cas 1918D 121

Consignee

(1) "Where the consignee has suffered special damages from the negligent delay in the transportation or delivery of goods by a carrier, the consignee is the proper party plaintiff in an action ex delicto, being 'the real party in interest' within the intent and meaning of section 1365 of the General Statutes of 1906, providing that 'any civil action at law may be maintained in the name of the real party in interest.' "—Florida East Coast Ry. Co. v. Peters, 73 So. 151, 152, 72 Fla. 311, Ann Cas.1918D 121.

(2) It has also been held that, notwithstanding title may have been goods may maintain an action for delay in transporting them, although the shipment was made in the name of another person.[23] Where the consignor makes a contract of shipment with the carrier, it has been held that he may maintain an action thereon for damages due to delay in transportation, irrespective of the question of ownership,[24] and that a consignee cannot sue the carrier for loss caused by delay where the consignor made the contract of carriage, unless the bill of lading has been assigned or indorsed to him by the consignor.[25]

Under the Carmack amendment to the Interstate Commerce Act, an action against a carrier for negligent delay in an interstate shipment must be brought by the lawful holder of the bill of lading,[26] which may be the shipper, irrespective of the ownership of the goods.[27] Where the bill of lading has been surrendered to the carrier so that the owner might obtain possession of the goods,[28] or so that he might receive free transportation home from the destination of the shipment,[29] the provision of the Carmack amendment making the carrier liable to the lawful holder of the bill of lading does not prevent the owner from maintaining an action for the carrier's negligent delay.

The consignor may maintain an action without alleging ownership, especially where the declaration shows that the consignee was to sell the goods for him,[30] where it is doubtful whether the sale was complete and title passed on delivery of the goods to the carrier,[31] or where he sells goods to be delivered at a place and contracts with a carrier to transport them to the place of delivery.[32] Where the consignor and the consignee are the same, the presumption is that the ownership continued in the consignor and he may maintain an action for delay in delivery;[33] and where a shipment of this character is made, the buyer does not necessarily receive such a beneficial interest in the goods during transportation as to give him a right to sue the carrier for delay in transportation;[34] but a consignee of goods in whom title is vested, but who is not entitled to delivery of the goods by the carrier until payment of the price, may maintain an action for damages caused by delay in transportation.[35] An assignment by a consignor of a claim for damages for delay in the delivery of goods vests retained by the consignor, the consignee of goods may sue the carrier for losses caused by delay in their transmission, although he refuses to accept them because not sooner delivered.—Clute v Chicago, etc., R. Co, 111 P. 431, 83 Kan. 333, 30 L.R.A.,N.S., 1071.

F. o. b. sale

The fact that plaintiff, before making a shipment of fruit by defendant express company, had sold the same to the consignees f. o. b. place of shipment, did not defeat its right to maintain an action for damages for negligent delay in transportation, causing damage to the fruit, where because of such damage the consignees refused to accept it, plaintiff released them from their contracts, and the fruit was sold for its account.—American Ry. Express Co. v. Island & Gypsum Fruit Co., C.C.A.Ohio, 300 F. 311.

Fruit brokers who shipped fruit could sue carrier in their names for damages resulting to them as brokers, or to principals, from negligent delay in delivering shipment, and the carrier could not on its own motion assert rights of owners of shipment to avoid plaintiffs' recovery.—Terry v. the right to sue for such damages in the assignee.[36] Where a contract of shipment is made by a manufacturer for the buyer's benefit on filling an order, the consignee, being the real party in interest, may recover thereon for a delay in shipment.[37]

The agent of the owner, who has made a contract of shipment, may sue for delay in delivery.[38] Where property has been consigned by the general owner to an agent who has a special interest therein, and the goods are negligently delayed in transit, and converted by the carrier, so that sales thereof previously made by the consignee are canceled, such consignee may maintain an action in his own name against the carrier for the recovery of damages on account of lost commissions and for the value of the property converted.[39]

§ 215. Pleading

a. Complaint, declaration, or petition
b. Plea or answer
c. Other pleadings
d. Issues, proof, and variance

a. Complaint, Declaration, or Petition

Plaintiff's initial pleading must set out facts sufficient to make out a good cause of action for delay in transportation.

The complaint, declaration, or petition in an action for damages for delay in transportation must, in proper form, state facts sufficient to establish a good cause of action and to justify a recovery.[40] The pleading must so apprise defendant of the nature of the demand against it as will enable it to prepare its defenses.[41] It is not essential to allege a special contract, in order to render the carrier liable for an unreasonable delay in shipment.[42] it is sufficient for the complaint to show that the goods were received by the carrier for shipment.[43] Generally the consideration for the assumption of obligation by the carrier need not be alleged.[44] Furthermore, it is not essential that the complaint should allege that the freight charges were paid in advance,[45] or that an offer was made to pay such charges in advance.[46] Where, however, a special contract is relied on, the complaint should disclose its terms and character.[47]

Pleading in actions for loss or injury generally see infra §§ 251–253.

Time for transportation and delay. A complaint, in an action for damages for delay in transportation, should allege the carrier's duty to carry within a reasonable time,[48] and should plead the reasonable time for transportation of the shipment between the initial and terminal points of the carriage.[49] While

No illegal contract alleged

Where, in a suit against a railroad for damages for delay of a shipment of cattle, plaintiff alleged that they were not shipped on a train on which the carrier's agent represented that they would be shipped, such averment did not allege a contract stipulating the particular time of shipment, train, and market, which would be in violation of law as being discriminatory.—Panhandle & S. the complaint must show that there was an unreasonable delay in the transportation of the goods, a general allegation that by reason of defendant's negligence the goods were unreasonably delayed, without setting out the evidential facts, will be sufficient,[50] at least as against a general demurrer.[51] It has been held to be sufficient to allege facts showing an unreasonable time consumed in transit along with a general allegation that it was a negligent delay.[52] If, in addition to unreasonable delay in transportation, the complaint alleges failure to furnish cars within the time agreed, it should show what part of the delay was occasioned by the failure to furnish cars and what part occurred en route.[53]

Negativing defenses. Where the complaint charges an unreasonable delay, it is not necessary that it should go further and negative facts which would justify the delay, the same being matters of defense.[54]

Injury and damages. The complaint should show in what manner the injuries were sustained by the delay.[55] Damages which may be assumed to result necessarily from the unreasonable delay need not be specially alleged.[56] A petition not alleging the market value at the destination when delivery should be made, and when delivery was made, by some measure, as by the pound, but merely alleging that the market value of the shipment was less by a named sum, when sold, than it would have been but for the delay, is insufficient as against a special exception.[57] It has been held that a petition alleging a delay in the failure of a live stock shipment to arrive at its destination when it should have done so, requiring the shipper to hold it for a later market, is insufficient as against a special exception in failing to allege why the shipment was not sold on the market next after delivery, if in fact it was held over.[58] In order to entitle the shipper to special damages, that is, such damages as are not the ordinary consequence of the delay complained of, or which were not of a character to be reasonably anticipated by the parties at the time of the contract of shipment, it is essential that such damages be stated,[59] and also the facts which would make them legally recoverable.[60] It is in all cases necessary to plead notice to the carrier, at or before making the contract of shipment, of the special conditions rendering the special damages claimed the natural and probable result of the breach, under circumstances showing that the contract was to some extent based on such conditions.[61]

No facts in addition to market value depreciation

Where a common carrier negligently omits to transport merchandise within a reasonable time, damages recoverable consisting of the difference in its value at the time and place it ought to have been delivered and at the time of actual delivery are general damages, being deemed, in the nature of things, to have been within the contemplation of the parties at the time of contracting, as a probable consequence of an unreasonable delay, and hence the shipper is not required to set forth in a complaint for negligent delay any facts, apart from decline in market value of the goods, showing actual loss from such cause—Austin, Nichols & Co v Chesapeake & O Ry. Co., 196 N Y S 757, 119 Misc. 565.

61. Fla—Florida East Coast Ry. Co v. Peters, 86 So. 217, 80 Fla. 382.

The fact that plaintiff undertakes specifically to state erroneous elements of damages and how and wherein they accrued is a matter for special demurrer.[62] If punitive damages are sought, the pleading must set out such facts as will justify their allowance.[63] In an action against a carrier for negligent delay in delivering goods brought to recover exemplary damages, an allegation that the carrier "wantonly refused or failed to deliver" the goods does not warrant the recovery of exemplary damages, since the pleading is no stronger than its weakest alternative.[64]

Amendments. An amended petition stating an entirely different cause of action than that set out in the original petition is properly stricken.[65] The necessary allegation as to the carrier's duty to transport within a reasonable time may be supplied by amendment, and evidence may be introduced to show what is a reasonable time.[66]

b. Plea or Answer

Matters of excuse or other special defense must be specially pleaded.

Excuse for unusual delay is a matter of defense,[67] and if defendant relies on this defense, the pleading must show every fact essential to the legal validity of the excuse.[68] Thus, if a war-time embargo,[69] or government shipment preference,[70] or a strike[71] is relied on as a defense for delay in transportation, such defense, to be availed of, must be specially pleaded since it is not available under the general denial. Likewise, if the carrier attempts to excuse its delay on the ground of an unprecedented rush of business, it must plead such defense specially,[72] and it must allege notice of such circumstance to the shipper before the shipment was made.[73] Such defenses as waiver or estoppel of plaintiff,[74] contract provision limiting the carrier's liability,[75] or failure by plaintiff to make his claim within the time fixed by the shipping contract[76] must be specially pleaded to be availed of.

Not ground for general demurrer

In action for damages for an unreasonable delay in delivering shipment, petition alleging contract of carrier, its breach, and damages in a certain sum was sufficient to sustain at least a recovery for nominal damages, and the court did not err in overruling the general demurrer thereto; but the fact that it went further and undertook specifically to state what would be erroneous elements of such damage, and how and wherein they accrued, was matter for special demurrer.—Southern Ry. Exception for lack of notice

In an action for damage to stock from delay, an answer that the cattle were not delivered to the stockyards in the usual time, because the crowded condition of such stockyards prevented such delivery, and that such crowded condition had existed for a considerable time, was subject to the exception that it was not alleged that the carrier gave the shipper notice as to such crowded condition, nor that the shipper had such notice, nor that the carrier did not know of such condition, nor allege any cause why carrier could not have given notice to the shipper of such condition.—Billberry v. Hines, Mo.App., 237 S.W. 906.

76. Mich.—Boyd v. King, 167 N.W. 901, 201 Mich. 436, certiorari de-

If contributory negligence of plaintiff in failing to call for the goods for several days after arrival is relied on, the plea will be insufficient if it alleges no duty on plaintiff so to do, nor any notice of the arrival, nor any facts that would relieve defendant from giving notice.[77] A plea in an action against a carrier for failure to deliver freight within a reasonable time which does not show that the cars referred to therein contained the freight, or that the shipper was responsible for the matters set up, and which does not show that the matters alleged might not have had reference to a different shipment, is bad.[78] It has been held, however, that, under a general denial, the carrier has the right to show that the delay in fact occurred on a connecting line for which it was not liable.[79]

c. Other Pleadings

The general rules of pleading govern the sufficiency of plaintiff's replication.

Where, in an action against a carrier for delay in delivering goods, defendant pleaded a special contract exempting it from liability from delay caused by strikes or mobs, and that prompt delivery was prevented by mobs of strikers and sympathizers, a replication by plaintiff, professing to be an answer to the whole plea, alleging plaintiff's infancy when the contract was made, is insufficient since the defense alleged constitutes a defense irrespective of the contract and the replication fails to answer the whole plea[80]

d. Issues, Proof, and Variance

The general rules governing issues, proof, and variance control in actions against a carrier for delay in transportation.

The issues in an action for damages for delay in transportation are restricted to those raised by the pleadings.[81] In an action for damages for negligent delay in transporting a shipment plaintiff must show negligence arising out of an unreasonable delay,[82] and also that such negligence was the proximate cause of the damage.[83] Some competent evidence must be introduced tending to show what is a reasonable time or to show the length of time ordinarily required to transport such a shipment between the initial and terminal points,[84] and that a longer time was actually required.[85]

Plaintiff must prove facts on which the proper measure of his damages may be drawn.[86] Thus, in order for a shipper of goods, destined to be sold, to recover damages due to delay he must affirmatively show the difference between the market value of the goods on arrival and what would have been

Petition insufficient to support issue
A petition in an action against a carrier for delay in transporting cattle to market, failing to allege that the shipper in the exercise of reasonable care under the circumstances was justified in believing that the cattle if reshipped to another market would sell for a higher price after deducting the extra expense, is insufficient to support the issue of whether the shipper exercised ordinary care in reshipping the cattle—Wichita Valley Ry Co v. Amount of damages proximately resulting
In action against carrier for delay in delivery of crate material for use in shipment of tomatoes, plaintiff must prove the amount of damages suffered as a proximate result of the delay.—Florida East Coast Ry. Co. v. Peters, 73 So. 151, 72 Fla. 311, Ann.Cas.1918D 121.

Proximate, natural, certain loss
Plaintiff suing for loss of tomatoes from carrier's delay in transporting crates must show carrier's negligence, a proximately resulting loss such as carrier from information or common knowledge should reasonably have regarded as natural to have proximately resulted or which was reasonably contemplated as proximate result, and that loss was not remote, contingent, or incapable of reasonably certain ascertainment.—Florida East Coast Ry. Co. v. Peters, 83 So. 559, 77 Fla 411.

Okl—Lusk v Durant Nursery Co., 232 P 11, 73 Okl. 269.

86. Ill—Fox v Canadian Pac. Ry. Co, 260 Ill App. 482.

Value at point of shipment
Where the amount of loss from delay is governed by the value of the goods at the place and time of shipment and there is no evidence of such value but only of the value at the point of delivery, the action must fail—Fox v. Canadian Pac. Ry. Co., 260 Ill App. 482.

the market value had the shipment been delivered without delay.[87]

In accordance with the general principles applicable to civil actions generally, the pleadings and the proof must correspond.[88] The evidence offered must be limited to the issues made by the pleading, and a material variance between the pleadings and the proof will be fatal to a recovery.[89] Thus, where a particular affirmative defense is not pleaded, evidence thereof is not admissible.[90] Likewise, where special damages are not pleaded, they cannot be proved,[91] and, if sought, they must be proved.[92]

A general allegation of delay in transportation will justify proof of delay at any point along the journey.[93] Where plaintiff pleads a special agreement by the carrier to deliver before a certain time, there is no variance between such allegation and proof of a bill of lading containing an agreement to deliver with reasonable dispatch where parol evidence shows the carrier's understanding that "reasonable dispatch" in such agreement required delivery before the time alleged.[94] In order to set up defendant carrier's estoppel to rely on a contractual limitation of time within which an action for damages for delay might be brought plaintiff must affirmatively plead such estoppel.[95]

§ 216. Presumptions and Burden of Proof

a. Presumptions
b. Burden of proof

a. Presumptions

General rules apply as to presumptions in actions against a carrier for delay in transportation.

General rules as to presumptions, see C.J.S. title Evidence §§ 114–157, also 22 C.J. p 82 note 0–p 157 note 60, apply in actions against a carrier for delay in transportation. Thus, where a shipment ordered diverted by telegram is delayed because of a delay in the delivery of the telegram, due either to the negligence of the carrier or of the telegraph company, without evidence to support it, it cannot be presumed that the negligence was due to the car-

Market price at due date
In action against carrier for delay in transportation of eggs, proof of date when eggs should have been delivered to consignee and market value at such time was essential to proof of damages.—Barrett v. Van Pelt, 45 S.Ct. 437, 268 U.S. 85, 69 L.Ed. 857, reversing Van Pelt v. Barrett, 199 N.Y.S. 509, 205 App.Div. 332.

Market value on delivery date
Although carrier's liability for damages to onions in transit is proved, the shipper cannot recover if he fails to produce competent proof of the market value on delivery, as a basis for damages.—William R. Mankoff, Inc v. Erie R. Co., 161 N.Y.S. 346, 97 Misc. 415.

Contract proved not one alleged
In an action against a railroad for breach of an inseparable contract for the shipment of cattle and the furnishing of cars therefor which is the contract declared on, the cause alleged was not supported by evidence showing a contract made verbally over the telephone for the furnishing of cars, and a shipment contract in writing.—Thee v. Injury not alleged
In an action for delay in the delivery of a trunk, where the complaint alleged that because of the delay plaintiff was deprived of the use of the trunk, but did not allege injury to its contents, evidence of deterioration of the contents because of the delay is inadmissible under the pleadings.—Lichterman v. Barrett, 157 N.Y.S. 882.

Liability as warehouseman or for conversion
In consignee's action for delayed delivery of goods resulting from deviation, questions of carrier's liability for conversion and of liability of warehousemen are irrelevant.—Levin v. International-Great Northern R. Co., Tex.Civ.App., 45 S.W.2d 435, error dismissed.

No excuse pleaded
In action for unreasonable delay in delivery of cattle shipment, plaintiffs cannot recover, where their evidence discloses an excusing cause, and no excusing cause was pleaded.—McMickle v. Wabash Ry. Co., Mo.App., 209 S.W. 611.

Shrinkage when not in transportation
In an action for damages for delay as to a shipment of live stock, testimony as to amount of shrinkage of sheep and lambs when taken by shipper from stock pens, and thus temporarily withdrawn from transportation, put on pasture, and later shipped to market, is incompetent as not within the issues of the cause.—Mourer v. rier.[96] In the light of evidence that similar conditions existed on defendant's terminal tracks several years before, it may be presumed that defendant by the exercise of reasonable care should have had knowledge of a congested condition on such tracks which occasioned the delay.[97]

Presumptions and burden of proof in actions for loss or injury generally see infra § 254.

b. Burden of Proof

(1) In general
(2) Excuse for delay
(3) Damages

(1) In General

The burden of proof in actions against a carrier for delay in transportation is governed by general rules.

General rules as to burden of proof, see C.J.S. title Evidence §§ 103–113, also 22 C.J. p 68 note 43–p 82 note 48, apply in actions against a carrier for delay in transportation. In an action to recover damages from an unreasonable delay in transportation of freight, the burden is on the shipper in the first instance to show delivery of the freight to the carrier for delivery at a certain destination.[98]

Where plaintiff bases his action for delay on an alleged promise to transport within a reasonable time, and defendant pleads the absence of such a promise, plaintiff has the burden of proving the promise in issue.[99] In order, however, that a carrier may avail itself of a clause in the bill of lading exempting it from liability for delay caused by a strike, it has the burden of establishing that the strike caused the particular delay.[1] Likewise, if the carrier seeks to avoid liability for delay in transportation under a contract by which a lower rate was charged, and in consideration of which defendant was exonerated from damages for negligent delay beyond the actual expense incurred, the burden is on it to show that plaintiff knew at the time of shipment the rates charged and the conditions under which the shipment was made, and that he agreed to ship under such rate [2]

The burden is on the shipper to show that the carrier failed to deliver the goods within a reasonable time.[3] In other words, it devolves on the shipper to prove that a longer time was actually consumed than was necessary for the purpose.[4]

Improper address. Where the delayed goods are shown by defendant express carrier to have been improperly addressed, resulting in the transportation of the goods to the wrong destination, the burden is on the shipper to show that the carrier was negligent in not making delivery to the proper consignee within a reasonable time thereafter.[5]

(2) Excuse for Delay

While there is some authority to the contrary, the rule is that when unusual delay is shown the prima facie case of negligence is made and the carrier has the burden of proving excuse for the delay. Bad condition of the goods shown by plaintiff to have been unreasonably delayed puts the burden on the carrier to excuse its negligence.

It is clearly the majority rule, as stated in Corpus Juris, which has often been quoted and cited as authority therefor,[6] that when evidence of unusual delay is adduced, a prima facie case of negligence is made out, and the burden then devolves on the carrier to explain or excuse the delay and to show that it arose from some cause other than the carrier's negligence, or that of its agents or servants,[7] or to show that there was no delay,[8] or that the delay caused plaintiff no injury,[9] the reason being that such facts are generally peculiarly within the carrier's knowledge.[10] This rule applies although the contract was "subject to delay"[11]

It has been held that the burden of explaining the delay is not on defendant carrier if the shipper or his agent accompanied the shipment and knew the reason for the delay.[12] On the other hand, it has also been held that the burden is on the carrier to prove that the delay was not caused

Explanation required by plaintiff's showing

(1) Shipper presenting proof showing that his shipment was materially delayed beyond usual time, together with evidence of proximate loss, makes out prima facie case.—Leo Lococo's Sons v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 82 S.W.2d 332, 259 Ky. 299.

(2) Evidence as to unusual and long delay in delivering a carload of wheat puts the burden on the carrier of excusing its delay and of showing that it was not negligent.—National Elevator Co. v. Great Northern Ry. Co., 170 N.W. 515, 141 Minn. 407.

(3) Proof that car of grapes was delivered nearly nine hours after it arrived about one mile away required railroad to excuse delay.—Pusater v. New York, C. & St. L. R. Co., 220 N.Y.S. 438, 129 Misc. 24.

(4) Shipper, proving that it had taken fifty seven hours to transport car of bananas, that twenty seven hours was customary and usual time under ordinary conditions, and that delay prevented sale before fall in market price, made out prima facie case, requiring explanation or justification by carrier.—Leo Lococo's Sons v. Louisville & N. R. Co., supra.

Failure to maintain schedule

Liability for carrier's failure to run trains on scheduled time is not established by mere proof of delay, at most proof of delay does no more than to place on the carrier the duty of explaining such delay.—Stephens v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 227 N.W. 875, 200 Wis. 181.

Inability of train to carry shipment

In an action for damage to cotton seed from delay, the burden was on defendant to show that a train passing after the car in question was loaded and billed could not carry it on that day, since its servants made up the train and knew the conditions, and, failing therein, it cannot complain of the absence of plaintiff's evidence that it could.—Hines v. Helena Cotton Oil Co., 227 S.W. 418, 147 Ark. 328.

Not regular stops

In an action for damages sustained by reason of delays in the transportation of cattle, the burden of showing that certain stops complained of were not regular scheduled stops, and of explaining them in case they were not regular stops, is on defendant.—Alton v. Mineral Point & N. Ry. Co., 222 Ill.App. 105.

Overcoming obstacles

Carrier sued for delay and for refusal to carry cattle to destination bears the burden of proving that it exercised reasonable effort and due diligence to overcome obstacles.—Riddle v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 210 N.W. 770, 203 Iowa 1232.

Press of business

Where a shipper has shown an unreasonable delay by carrier in making shipment, carrier must show that equipment is adequate for all ordinary purposes and under ordinary conditions, and that delay occurred by reason of an unusual volume of business of which it had no notice at time shipment was accepted.—Southeastern Express Co. v. Bowers, Inc., Tenn.App., 109 S.W.2d 851.

Presumption not conclusive

Presumption of negligence of carrier arising from delay in shipment of stock can and must be rebutted and explained by defendant carrier.—Davis v. Graham, 225 P. 789, 31 Wyo. 239.

Proof of specific acts unnecessary

Proof of unusual or unreasonable delay in interstate transportation of live stock raises a presumption of the carrier's negligence without proof of specific acts thereof.—Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co. v. Simmons, 228 P. 983, 101 Okl. 164.

Strike

Where carrier's answer set up a strike as a defense to an action for damages for delay in a shipment of cattle, the burden was on the carrier to prove the existence of the strike.—Stillman v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 192 N.W. 860, 196 Iowa 612.

by its negligence despite the fact that the owner of the shipment accompanied it,[13] and this holding has been held not to conflict with the rule that where, by contract, a shipper accompanies his live stock with tenders or caretakers no presumption of negligence on the part of the carrier arises merely from the proof that loss or injury has attended the shipment.[14]

Minority rule. In one jurisdiction the rule as to the burden of explaining or excusing the delay differs considerably from the general rule just discussed. Thus, it is held that in actions for damages from delay in transporting interstate shipments, the burden is on plaintiff not only to show the delay but to show that it was negligent.[15] This is said to be the common-law rule on the subject, as it was the law in this jurisdiction in cases involving intrastate shipments as well before it was changed by statute.[16] A showing of mere delay without explanation, or of unusual delay, is not of itself sufficient to give rise to a presumption of negligence,[17] it being necessary that some cause of the delay unexplained by defendant be shown by plaintiff.[18] Nevertheless, it is recognized that the cause of delays in carriage of freight is usually a matter peculiarly within the knowledge of defendant carrier,[19] and such being the case circumstances raising a fair or reasonable,[20] or even slight,[21] inference of negligence will authorize a recovery. Moreover, the delay itself is of probative force to

However, it has been held that delay in shipment of an interstate live stock shipment prima facie establishes the carrier's negligence.—Rissler v. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co., Mo. App., 183 S.W. 676.

Burden remains throughout

In an action for damages for delay in delivery of an interstate shipment, plaintiff has the burden of showing that the delay was due to the carrier's negligence, which burden remains on plaintiff throughout the entire case.—Bland v. Chicago & A. R. Co., Mo.App., 232 S.W. 232.

Federal rule applies

In an action for damages due to delay in delivering a shipment of cattle from a point in Missouri to a point in Illinois, mere proof of delay will not establish prima facie the negligence of the carrier, for Rev.St.1919, §§ 9926, 10449, as to prima facie proof of negligence, are inapplicable, the shipment being interstate, so that the liability of the carrier is governed by the rules of decision in force in the federal courts.—Bland v. Chicago & A. R. Co., Mo.App., 232 S.W. 232.

Burden to show custom

Shipper of interstate cattle shipment had burden of showing negligence of stockyards to be carrier's negligence, and that carrier was party to custom to deliver into consignees' sales pens.—Bozworth v. Wabash Ry. Co., 58 S.W.2d 448, 332 Mo. 277, affirming Bosworth v. Wabash Ry. Co., App., 21 S.W.2d 1110—Burton v. Wabash Ry. Co., App., 22 S.W.2d 201, affirmed 58 S.W.2d 443, 332 Mo. 268.

Burden held sustained

In an action for damages for delay in interstate shipment of sheep, evidence on the part of plaintiff was sufficient to sustain the burden on him to show some negligence on the part of the carrier in addition to delay.—Moore v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., Mo.App., 223 S.W. 1079.

Direct evidence unnecessary

Where shipper of live stock alleged that railroad company was guilty of negligent delay in transportation, shipper, while having burden of proving such negligent delay, need not establish it by direct evidence.—Robinson v. Bush, 200 S.W. 757, 199 Mo.App. 184.

show negligence when connected with other evidence.[22] Where repeated delays are shown to have occurred en route a prima facie case of negligence will be made out unless defendant satisfactorily explains such delays.[23] The above rule insofar as it affects intrastate shipments has been changed by statute. Thus, by a statute so providing, the failure of the carrier to transport within a reasonable time constitutes prima facie evidence of negligence in transportation.[24]

In another jurisdiction, in a case involving an interstate shipment, it has been held that proof by plaintiff that a shipment of live stock has been delayed considerably longer than a reasonable time does not have any tendency to prove that defendant carrier was responsible for the delay.[25]

Condition of goods on arrival. The failure of a railroad carrier to deliver live stock in a proper condition within a reasonable time has been held to raise a presumption of negligence and place the burden on the carrier to excuse itself from negligence,[26] but it does not raise a presumption that bruises and scars on the animals were caused by such unreasonable delay.[27] Plaintiff does not have the burden of proving that the injuries to the live stock did not result from his own negligence in failing to care for them.[28] It has been held, however, that where live stock arrives at its destination in good condition and is in good condition when unloaded, the burden of proving unreasonable delay in spotting the shipment for unloading, whereby the stock is alleged to have been injured by the cold, is on plaintiff shipper.[29]

In the case of perishable food products, it has been held that where plaintiff has shown an unreasonable delay, the bad condition of goods, which were in good condition when accepted for shipment, will raise the question as to whether the carrier exercised the degree of care required of it.[30] It has also been held in an action for damages caused by alleged unreasonable delay in the shipment of perishable goods that, while the burden is on plaintiff to show that there was an unreasonable delay,

Failure to explain

If carrier attempts to explain repeated delays in transportation of shipment and explanation fails, carrier is liable.—Smothers v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., Mo App., 15 S.W. 2d 884.

Many delays

In an action by a shipper of cattle for damages caused by several unexplained delays in transit, some other delays being caused by unsuccessful attempts to make a coupling with a snowplow to show that delays were unavoidable, the burden is on the carrier to prove that the delays were unavoidable—Gilbreath v. Atchison, T. & S F. R. R., Mo App., 217 S W 636.

24. Mo—Cloyd v. Wabash Ry. Co, App., 240 S W. 885—Baker v. Schaff, App., 211 S W. 103—Dawson Bros. v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co, App., 194 S W. 743.
10 C.J. p 302 note 15.

Construction of statute

A statute providing that every common carrier is liable for loss, damage, or injury to goods caused by delay in transit due to negligence while the same is being carried by it, and further providing that in any action to recover for damages sustained by delay the burden of proof is on defendant to show that such delay was not due to negligence, has been construed to mean that, in all cases involving intrastate shipments by all common carriers, on proof by plaintiff of the delay and that damage or loss has resulted therefrom, the burden would then shift to defendant to show that such delay was not due to its negligence—Cunningham v. Chicago & A. R. Co., Mo, 215 S.W. 5—Arky v. Wells Fargo & Co. Express, Mo.App, 229 S.W. 824

Express company

Rev.St.1919 § 10449, providing that, on proof by plaintiff shipper of delay and damages caused thereby, the burden of proof shifts to defendant carrier to show that the delay was not due to its negligence, includes express companies.—Arky v. Wells Fargo & Co. Express, Mo App, 229 S W. 824.

Not applicable to interstate shipment

In action for delay in interstate shipment of live stock, burden of proving that delay was occasioned by defendant's negligence was on plaintiff, notwithstanding Laws 1913 p 177, making proof of unreasonable delay prima facie evidence of negligence, the burden of proof being a matter of substance, and hence governed, as to interstate shipments, by the federal laws, and not the state laws.—Baker v. Schaff, Mo. App, 211 S W 103.

Prima facie case made out

Shipper suing railroad for delay in moving cattle to market makes out prima facie case of negligence, sufficient to go to jury on showing that cattle did not reach market in reasonably sound condition in time ordinarily required to transport such shipment to destination.—St. Louis & S F Ry. Co. v. May, 236 P 888, 110 Okl. 170

Burden to show proximate causation

In an action against a carrier for damages to sheep from delay in placing cars in position for unloading, the burden was on shipper to prove the carrier's negligence in delaying the unloading too late in the day, so that the sheep were chilled, was the proximate cause of their loss—Smart v. Oregon Short Line R. Co, 183 P 320, 54 Utah 606.

this burden is prima facie met, unless the state of the pleadings changes the rule, if it is shown that the goods were injured during transportation, whereupon the burden is cast on defendant carrier to show want of liability on account of negligent delay or for any other cause.[31]

(3) Damages

One seeking to recover special damages for breach of a carriage contract must show that damages were within the contemplation of the parties. A carrier relying on a requirement in the contract requiring the shipper to give notice of claim for damages must prove the contract, its reasonableness, and its breach by the shipper.

As stated in Corpus Juris, which has been quoted as authority therefor,[32] one who seeks to recover special damages for breach of a contract of carriage must show that such damages were within the contemplation of both parties to the contract,[33] otherwise, he can recover only such damages as in the usual course of things flow from the breach.[34] He must also show notice to the carrier at the time of the shipment of special circumstances from which said damages might arise.[35]

Want of notice of damages. If the carrier relies on a contract requiring the shipper to give notice of claim for damage, the burden is on the carrier to prove such contract, and to show that it is reasonable,[36] and that the shipper failed to comply with the requirement.[37]

§ 217. Admissibility of Evidence

a. In general
b. Matters of defense or mitigation
c. Damages

a. In General

General rules of evidence in negligence cases govern the admissibility of evidence in actions against a carrier for negligent delay in transportation.

The admissibility of evidence to show negligence in actions of this character is controlled by the rules governing proof of negligence generally;[38] the inquiry should be limited to whether there was negligence after the carrier accepted the shipment.[39] On the question of defendant's negligence and unreasonable delay, evidence is admissible to show the actual time consumed in the shipment in controversy,[40] the distance between the initial and terminal points,[41] that the time consumed in transporting the goods was unusually long,[42] and the ex-

Suit on the tort

Where the consignee does not sue on the express contract evidenced by the bill of lading, but on the tort by the carrier of his breach of duty to transport within a reasonable time, and on the custom of the carrier to notify the consignee immediately after the arrival of the goods at their destination, and where the carrier sets up the bill of lading with a provision requiring notice of loss to be given to the carrier, the burden lies on the carrier to further sustain its affirmative plea and defense by showing the failure of plaintiff to give the notice as required.—Southern Ry. Byers, 36 S.Ct. 410, 240 U.S. 612, 60 L.Ed. 825, L.R.A.1917A. 197, reversing Byers v. Southern Express Co., 81 S.E. 741, 165 N.C. 542.

(2) Where bill of lading was expressly made subject to classification and tariffs, exclusion, in action for negligent delay in transportation of live stock, of portions of published tariff and classification requiring separation, by partitions, of different kinds of stock in same car, is error.—Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Griner & Rustin, 127 S.E. 878, 33 Ga.App. 705.

Proper matters of inquiry

In an action for delay in transportation of goods, the time ordinarily required for carriage, preparations by the carrier, the freight dispatched, the character of the freight, the information given to the shipper, or particular reasons for speedy transportation and delivery, and kindred circumstances are admissible.—Stevens v. act quantum of the wrongful delay.[43] Likewise, evidence of the usual or customary time in running trains from the point at which the shipment was made to its destination is admissible,[44] even over the lines of other carriers,[45] provided it is given by witnesses properly qualified to testify on the subject.[46] Evidence as to the time consumed by certain prior or subsequent shipments of similar freight over defendant's road is admissible,[47] provided the conditions are shown to be the same.[48] The fact that the shipments as to which testimony was given were made several years before does not render the testimony inadmissible for remoteness,[49] the difference in time affecting only its weight.[50]

On the question of the unreasonableness of the delay, evidence of information given by the carrier's agent as to when the shipment would reach its destination is admissible,[51] such evidence not being a showing of a special contract or a varying of the contract sued on[52] or of a promise to extend greater favor to plaintiff than those enjoyed by the public.[53] Where no contract to deliver a shipment at a definite time is pleaded, an agreement to deliver at a time certain is inadmissible where the bill of lading simply provides for reasonable dispatch.[54] Furthermore, it has been held that an alleged oral agreement by defendant's local agent to make certain connections so that a live stock shipment would arrive early at its destination should be excluded where the action is for negligent delay and not for deception.[55]

Admissibility of evidence in actions for loss or injury generally and including loss or injury by delay see infra § 255.

Some evidence

Time required by carrier other than defendant to transport goods between two points is some evidence of time that ought to be taken by defendant.—Engemann v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 97 A. 152, 88 N.J.Law 451.

Sufficient basis for evidence

In suit for shrinkage of cattle shipped, from delay, testimony was admissible of usual time for such shipments, although given by witness who had accompanied only shipment in suit over the railroad involved, it appearing he had accompanied other shipments between such points over another route, and that the agent routed the shipment in suit upon application for most direct route.—Baker v. Holman, Tex. Civ.App., 196 S.W. 728.

Where based on limited experience

Shipper's evidence of time required for previous shipments based on his own limited experience held of little evidentiary value to prove unreasonable delay at the time in question.—Murphy v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 238 Ill.App. 553.

Prior shipment

In action for damages for delay in shipment of cotton under a contract to deliver within forty-eight hours, where the carrier defended on the ground that due to an embargo the shipment could not be made within the time agreed, there was no error in receiving evidence that defendant shipped other cotton from the place of consignment to destination prior to actual shipment of plaintiff's cotton.—St. Louis Southwestern Ry. Co. of Texas v. York, Tex.Civ.App., 252 S.W. 890.

Subsequent shipments

Where the bill of lading required the carrier to transport the goods with reasonable dispatch, it was not error, in an action for delay, to admit testimony of the shipper that he was told by defendant's clerk, through whom the shipment was made, when it would reach its destination.—Southern Pac. 55. Iowa.—Hill v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co., 161 N.W. 444, 179 Iowa 406.

Evidence admissible. Defendant may introduce evidence as to the schedule and ordinary time required for transport between the points involved in the case, although evidence as to other shipments than the one in controversy will be excluded if the bearing is too remote.[56] Defendant may thus show also that it did not run freight trains on Sunday between specified points on the route of transportation as a matter to be considered by the jury in determining whether or not the delay which included a Sunday was excusable;[57] but so-called schedules offered by defendant which were in fact mere oral directions agreed to by its officials in informal conference and not filed or published are properly excluded.[58]

Defendant may show that before entering into the contract of shipment the shipper was notified of the conditions that would prevent prompt shipment,[59] but where defendant failed to give notice, at the time the shipment was accepted, of conditions likely to cause delay,[60] or where it failed to show that these conditions were unforeseeable or accidental,[61] evidence of such conditions is inadmissible.

Since the law forbids a carrier to grant any shipper a preference, defendant's evidence tending to prove that in the handling of the shipment in question defendant took into consideration the rights of other shippers loading and unloading should be admitted.[62]

Where material and competent on one of the issues in the case, evidence as to the limited facilities of the carrier is admissible.[63] To rebut the imputation of the carrier's negligence in failing to have its employees ready to make heavy repairs at night when the need therefor was discovered, evidence that other railroads operating where the delay occurred did not keep their employees on hand at night is admissible.[64] Defendant's evidence tending to show when in the usual course of its business switching crews were at work should be admitted when material.[65]

A carrier guilty of delay and rough handling in transporting cattle for pasturage may show that the cattle, although injured, soon recovered.[66] That a like shipment made the following day over the same route from the same place to the same destination arrived a day earlier is admissible to meet the defense of unavoidable delay caused by the burning of a bridge.[67]

Evidence inadmissible. Defendant's evidence of the time consumed in transit between the points involved in isolated instances is inadmissible, in the absence of a showing of the circumstances surrounding such shipments.[68] To show unavoidable delay on the day of the injury, it has been held that evidence of a congestion of traffic several days previous thereto is not admissible.[69] Where it was shown that the shipper's cattle were held in defendant's pens for four days, evidence that other owners

Testimony of shipper's agent

In action against an express company for failure to transport and deliver a carload of strawberries with reasonable dispatch, evidence of shipper's agent familiar with the usual running time for carload shipments by express as to the schedule time for arrival of the train to which the car of berries was attached, and the usual and ordinary time consumed in trip to point of destination, was competent.—American Ry. Express Co. v. Peninsula Produce Exch., 121 A. 240, 142 Md. 422.

Too remote

In action for delayed transportation of a carload of berries intended for market, evidence that other cars were placed on the delivery track at the same time as plaintiff's car, and were unloaded for the morning market, and that no claim was filed with the company on account of those cars, held too remote, in absence of evidence showing contents of such cars, and when such were sold, and with what result.—American Ry. Rule of railroad inadmissible

In an action for delay in shipment of cattle, testimony as to a rule of the railroad as to period of time to be given for transportation of live stock from point where plaintiff's cattle were alleged to have been negligently delayed to the point to which such cattle were shipped held not admissible, since such testimony does not tend to either prove or disprove that the railroad was guilty of negligent delay in transporting cattle.—Wilkins v. of cattle had sometimes voluntarily left them in defendant's pens, while making arrangements to sell them, was properly excluded, where it appeared that plaintiffs were insisting upon prompt shipment.[70] Where plaintiff sues the carrier for goods delivered to it and injured in its warehouse before being shipped, claiming that it should have been shipped before the injury occurred, defendant's evidence that other shippers of the same commodity, injured at the same time, told it to ship the goods anyway is incompetent.[71] If the carrier has unconditionally agreed to transport within a given time, it cannot excuse nonperformance by alleging and proving an excuse which would otherwise be sufficient.[72]

Contributory negligence. On the question of the shipper's contributory negligence evidence as to the customary time for unloading a car of damaged fruit is admissible as bearing on the question whether the shipper proceeded with proper dispatch;[73] and where the carrier relied on the contributory negligence of plaintiff in failing to present the bill of lading, and the evidence showed that when the goods arrived at the point of destination the carrier charged the freight on them to plaintiff and accepted payment for the freight without the presentation of any bill of lading, evidence that it was not the custom of plaintiff to present bills of lading was admissible.[74]

c. Damages

Evidence material and relevant to the issue of the damages suffered by the plaintiff is admissible.

Evidence admissible. It is always competent to show knowledge by the contracting parties to a written contract of the circumstances on the basis of which the contract was made, for the purpose of showing what was within the contemplation of the parties in making the contract, whether a party seeks to recover general or special damages;[75] thus evidence tending to throw light on the preliminary negotiations between plaintiff and defendant carrier and to explain the notice of special damages given to defendant is admissible.[76] As a basis for the recovery of special damages, knowledge on the part of the carrier of circumstances requiring prompt shipment may be shown from circumstances in the case and need not be proved by direct and positive evidence of the communication of such circumstances to defendant.[77]

Any evidence which tends to throw light on the nature and to some extent the degree of deprivation suffered by the shipper owing to the carrier's negligence in delaying the goods shipped is relevant to the issue and admissible.[78] On the question of damages caused by unreasonable delay of goods shipped for sale, evidence of the difference between the market value at the time the shipment arrived and the market value at the time it should have arrived, if transported with reasonable dispatch, is admissible[79] and necessary, as shown supra § 215 d The admission of evidence of the market price of the goods shipped at a different place from its destination is not improper where it is shown that the

Where tobacco delivered to a carrier and placed in a warehouse was injured by water on the following day and the shipper sued, claiming that it should have been transported on the day it was received by the carrier, defendant's evidence that after the tobacco had been injured several tobacco shippers told carrier to ship the tobacco anyway, is incompetent as not tending to defeat plaintiff's contention that the carrier was negligent in not shipping the tobacco on day of delivery.—Lovelace v. market price at the point of destination was controlled by the price at the other place.[80] Evidence as to the time a delayed shipment was sold at its destination is admissible as tending to prove an element of damage.[81]

Evidence that other cattle were unloaded later than plaintiff's cattle and sold on the same day is admissible on the issue of whether plaintiff could have sold his cattle on that day and avoided loss by the decline of the market on the following day.[82]

In an action for negligent delay in delivering a printing press, evidence of the rental value of the press and other parts connected with it is competent.[83] In an action by a performer against an express company for delay in shipping a piano needed for his show, plaintiff's testimony as to the difference in the earnings of his show without the instrument and the earnings with it in like towns is admissible to show actual damages.[84]

Deterioration in the intrinsic value of the goods, due to the delay, such as by shrinkage in weight of livestock, being an element of damages, may be shown;[85] but for this purpose only the best evidence is admissible,[86] and evidence as to shrinkage will be excluded if it is too remote or speculative.[87]

In an action for damage to live stock in transportation, where plaintiff testifies concerning the time taken in different parts of the transit, it is error on cross-examination to exclude a question as to whether the stock after being held at a certain place for several months was not sent on to its destination and delivered to the consignee on the original bill of lading, since such evidence would affect the measure of damages for unreasonable delay.[88] Evidence of extra expense caused by the delay for feed of live stock at destination and at another market to which they were reshipped on account of the fall in the market during the delay is admissible.[89]

Evidence as to the amount of freight collected on the shipment is admissible, since unless the freight charges were paid they would have to be deducted from the amount of damages allowed for the delay in shipment.[90]

Evidence inadmissible. Immaterial evidence as to damages is, of course, properly excluded.[91] Evidence of the condition of the market on a designated day is immaterial and inadmissible, where the goods would not have arrived in the usual course of transit until a later day.[92] It cannot be shown that plaintiff had contracted for the sale of the goods at destination, and that they were refused because not such as

Condition of cattle at both points

In action for damages based on unreasonable delay in delivery of interstate shipment of cattle on through bill of lading in which plaintiff sought damages based on value at destination at the time they should have arrived, it was proper to show the condition of the cattle when loaded and at their destination, and to admit testimony as to their market value.—Louisville & N. In shipper's action against express company for negligent delay, certified copy of rates of company, on file with interstate commerce commission held inadmissible, the shipper not suing for a total loss but for damages caused by negligent delay and the agreed value of the shipment shedding no light on such inquiry.—Southern Express Co. v. Malone, 78 So. 408, 16 Ala.App. 414, certiorari denied 78 So. 990, 201 Ala. 700.

Effect on market value

In action for damages to shipment of strawberries, where contract did not require delivery in time for special market and there was no delay in transportation, objection to question as to effect on market value of berries, that arrived after usual market hours, was properly sustained, and in any event was without error where same testimony was subsequently admitted.—Peninsula Produce Exch. v. had been represented, and not for, or on account of, their condition, as such testimony does not tend to show the amount or limit of damages suffered.[93] Evidence as to profits lost by the carrier's delay in delivery is inadmissible where the profits would depend upon uncertain, conditional, and indeterminable circumstances.[94]

§ 218. Weight and Sufficiency of Evidence

General rules control as to the weight and sufficiency of the evidence in actions of the character under consideration.

The general rules applicable to the weight and sufficiency of evidence in civil actions generally apply in actions to recover damages caused by unreasonable delay in transportation.[95] In the notes below are found cases in which the courts have held the evidence to be sufficient or to be insufficient to support a verdict or judgment for plaintiff[96] or for defendant,[97] or to show that the shipment was

Special profit

Where, in an action against a railroad for negligently failing to deliver machinery, which caused the shutting down of a flouring-mill, the complaint did not allege nor the evidence show that any definite profit was lost, nor that the contract was such as to inform defendant that any loss of special profit would ensue, it was error to admit evidence showing what the special profit would have been during the time the mill was shut down, as the proper measure of damages was the legal interest on the capital invested, and such other damages as were the direct and necessary result of defendant's negligence.—Sharpe v. Southern R. Co., 41 S.E. 799, 130 N.C. 613.

Preponderance necessary

In action for unreasonable delay in transportation of car of cattle, shipper must show by preponderance of evidence negligence and that car was delayed in transit longer than usual and customary time for transportation.—Nashville, C. & St. L. Ry. v. Davis, Tenn.App., 114 S.W.2d 830.

(2) In an action for damages for delay in transportation of a shipment of horses, evidence held insufficient to support amount of plaintiff's verdict.—Cohn v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 158 N.W. 375, 100 Neb. 7.

(3) In action against railroad for delay in transporting stallions whereby shipper missed first day of sale, evidence held insufficient to sustain verdict for plaintiff without any showing that stallions such as his were sold on first day of sale, or that bidders were present to bid on such stallions.—Elliott v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 161 N.W. 347, 38 S.D. 371.

Tex.—Panhandle & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Thompson, Civ.App., 250 S.W. 751.

(2) In suit by shipper of cattle against a railroad on account of unreasonable delay in shipment and mixture while in transit with other cattle, evidence of plaintiff's damages held sufficient to sustain finding and judgment in his favor.—Behrends v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 198 Ill.App. 236.

(3) In an action against a common carrier for negligent delay in the interstate transportation of wheat, evidence held to sustain a judgment for damages in the sum of four hundred twenty-nine dollars and six cents.—Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co. v. Lawton Grain Co., 221 P. 1013, 94 Okl. 289.

Evidence held insufficient to sustain judgment

(1) In general.

Okl.—St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co. v. Herman, 224 P. 508, 98 Okl. 187.
S.D.—Petro v. Davis, 195 N.W. 504, 46 S.D. 603.

(2) Judgment against carrier for failure to deliver potatoes on New York market in two days held against preponderance of evidence.—Norfolk Southern R. Co. v. Hudgins, 142 S.E. 412, 150 Va. 229.—Norfolk Southern R. Co. v. Hudgins, 142 S.E. 409, 150 Va. 219.

Mere supposition insufficient

In action for delay in delivery of shipment of horses, shippers' testimony as to death of mare from lockjaw that, "I suppose that this was caused by placing the horses in this hot pen and feeding them on this coarse sedge grass hay," without evidence as to real cause of mare's death, was insufficient basis for judgment of damages, since contraction of lockjaw from such source, being contrary to general rule, should have been established by something more than mere supposition.—Ft. Worth & R. G. Ry. Co. v. Fleming, Tex.Civ.App., 212 S.W. 233.

97. Evidence showing delay caused no damage held to support judgment for defendant.—Bollier v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 254 P. 390, 123 Kan. 44.

Verdict warranted by evidence

In shipper's action against railroad for delay in transportation of live stock, in which the railroad present-transported within a reasonable time,[98] or to show what is the usual and customary time,[99] or to establish a negligent[1] or an unreasonable[2] or wanted no evidence, but rested the case upon the theory that plaintiff had failed to make out a cause of action, plaintiff's evidence held to warrant jury in returning a verdict for defendant—Ratliff v. Fort Worth & R G Ry Co, Tex.Civ.App, 245 S. W. 83.

98. Prima facie evidence

Proof of carrier's delivery of freight in usual time according to custom and course of carrier's business is prima facie evidence of reasonable time as respects carrier's liability for unreasonable delay in transportation—Nashville, C. & St. L Ry. v. Davis, Tenn App., 114 S. W.2d 830.

What was reasonable time

(1) In action against express company for delay in transportation of eggs, evidence as to usual time made by passenger trains held insufficient to sustain finding as to what was a reasonable time for transportation and delivery—Barrett v. Van Pelt, 45 S Ct 437, 268 U.S 85, 69 L Ed. 857, reversing Van Pelt v. Barrett, 199 N Y S 509, 205 App.Div. 332.

(2) Evidence merely showing when live stock was shipped and received, without proof of when it should have been received held insufficient to show it was not transported within reasonable time.—Cincinnati, N O & T. P. Ry. Co. v. Gano & Burgess, 284 S.W. 423, 215 Ky. 423.

99. Evidence insufficient

In action for delay in transporting live stock, testimony based upon two shipments held insufficient to show usual and customary time consumed in shipments.—Fort Worth & D. C. Ry. Co. v. Helm, Tex.Civ App, 30 S W 2d 492

1. Evidence showing freedom from neglect

In action for damages for delay in transporting a carload of poultry, evidence held to show carrier's freedom from negligence in shipment of poultry delayed in transit by strike of its employees—Ross v. Fear-Campbell Co., 147 N.E. 720, 88 Ind. App 527.

Bangor & A. R. Co., 98 A. 737, 115 Me 223.

(3) In an action by the consignee of seed potatoes for delay in delivery against the seller and a carrier of the shipment, evidence held to sustain the finding of the jury as to damages and not to show that the consignee was entitled to recover more than the five hundred dollars damages found by the jury—Hudgins Produce Co. v Missouri Pac R. Co., 215 S.W 606, 139 Ark. 363.

Evidence held not to preponderate against finding that delay was due to carrier's negligence—Kirby v. American Ry. Express Co., 242 P. 24, 137 Wash. 241.

2. Evidence held sufficient to establish unreasonable delay

(1) Evidence held sufficient to support a finding that there was unreasonable delay in the transportation of potatoes, and that such delay caused the loss of a sale thereof by the shipper—New York, P & N. R. Co v. Chandler, 106 S E. 684, 129 Va. 695.

(2) Evidence held to show an unreasonable and unexplained delay in the transportation of cattle.—McMickle v. Wabash Ry. Co., Mo App., 209 S W. 611

Evidence held insufficient to show unreasonable delay

(1) In action for damages for delay in transporting a shipment of hogs, evidence held not to show an unreasonable delay under the particular circumstances.—Wallace-Farmer v. Davis, Iowa, 199 N W. 307.

(2) Evidence held not to sustain finding of unreasonable delay in delivering car of grapes and loss by reason thereof—Allegrezza v. Great Northern Ry. Co, 221 N.W. 428, 175 Minn 374.

(3) In an action for delay in delivery, finding that defendant did not transport the goods with reasonable dispatch held against the weight of the evidence—Stutson v. Atchison, T. & S. F R Co, 183 N Y.S. 417, 192 App Div 482.

(4) Evidence held to show that a shipment of live stock was delivered at the stockyards on the same day it was made, as claimed by the carrier, and not on the following day, as claimed by the shippers, and that a jury finding that there was an unreasonable delay was flagrantly against the evidence—Illinois Central R. Co. v. Tanner, 225 S W. 745, 189 Ky. 706.

Evidence held to show that there was no unreasonable delay in transporting live stock to market, if it was delivered at the stockyards on the same day it was shipped, as claimed by defendant.—Illinois Cen-ton[3] delay, or other negligence on the carrier's part,[4] or to show that plaintiff's damage was caused by the carrier's delay.[5] In like manner the courts have frequently determined the sufficiency or insufficiency of the evidence to show a valid excuse for the carrier's delay,[6] or to show a special contract or agreement,[7] or compliance with a particular provision of the shipping contract,[8] or to establish the

tral R. Co. v. Tanner, 225 S.W. 745, 189 Ky. 706

Evidence held insufficient to establish a delay.—Goldsmith v. Florida East Coast Ry. Co., 217 Ill App 162.

3. Reckless indifference shown

In shipper's action against express company for delay, evidence, and inferences therefrom, held sufficient to authorize finding company acted with reckless indifference in failing to deliver, and with such disregard of consequences as to amount to wantonness authorizing punitive damages.—Southern Express Co. v. Malone, 78 So. 408, 16 Ala App. 414, certiorari denied 78 So. 990, 201 Ala. 700.

4. Care of shipment

Evidence held insufficient to show negligence on the part of a carrier in preserving meal after it arrived at point of destination in a heated condition, but, on the contrary, to tend to show the utmost care on part of the carrier—Hines v. First Guaranty State Bank of Aubrey, Tex.Civ.App., 230 S W. 764.

Delay due to unauthorized delivery

In action against carrier for delay in shipment of grain, evidence held to show that delay was a result of the unauthorized act of the carrier in delivering the car to the consignee first named in the bill of lading, where a new one issued provided for shipment to another city and to a different consignee.—Lusk v. Lawton Grain Co., 174 P. 793, 73 Okl. 43.

Negligence at connecting point

In an action for delay in shipment of live stock in transit, evidence held sufficient to justify finding of negligent refusal or failure of defendant railway to accept shipment at connecting point.—St. Louis Southwestern Ry. Co. of Texas v. Miller & White, Tex.Civ.App., 190 S. W. 819.

5. Finding not clearly wrong

In action upon a claim, with cross petition claiming damages for general deliveryman's failure to deliver ice cream within specified time, finding that damages were not caused by deliveryman's negligence held not so clearly wrong under evidence as to require a reversal—Reynolds v Hathaway, 167 N.W. 63, 102 Neb 299.

Negligence as proximate cause

(1) In a shipper's action against a carrier for negligent delay in transporting trainload of cattle from Vineyard, Tex., to Dickinson, N. D., evidence that the cattle were unloaded in a weakened, hungry, and almost dying condition, in a rainstorm, held to sustain a finding that defendant was negligent, and that such negligence was the proximate cause of the loss sustained—Richards v Northern Pac. Ry. Co, 173 N.W. 778, 42 N.D. 472.

(2) Evidence held to justify jury finding that delay in transportation was proximate cause of damage to plaintiff's horses, plaintiff, in directing amount of ventilation, having right to expect that transportation would be at night as usual—Stockman v Boston & M. R. R., 102 A. 560, 117 Me 35.

(3) Evidence that there was a delay of ten or twelve hours in transit, and that on arrival eight of the shipment of eighty-seven hogs were dead, and that this was an unusual number, held not enough, without more, to show that they died because of the delay or because of negligent handling of the car—Cloyd v. Wabash Ry. Co, Mo App., 240 S.W. 885.

10 C.J. p 304 note 57 [c].

6. Evidence insufficient to show excuse for delay

(1) Evidence offered by carrier held insufficient as an excuse for delay in delivery of a carload of wheat—National Elevator Co v Great Northern Ry. Co., 170 N W. 515, 141 Minn. 407.

(2) In an action against an express company for delay in delivery of a shipment of eggs, evidence held insufficient to show that the delay was caused by giving preference to governmental shipments.—Edwards v. American Ry Express Co, Mo. App., 216 S W. 781.

(3) Carrier sued for delay and refusal to carry cattle to destination because of strike of stockyard's employees held not to have shown that compliance with shipper's contract and demand for performance would have been unlawful discrimination—Riddle v. Chicago, B & Q R. Co., 210 N W. 770, 203 Iowa 1232.

Diligence in making repairs

Evidence disclosing that front drawbar of car in which bananas were being transported broke, that car was attached to end of next train traveling in opposite direction and taken back to most convenient place to be repaired, reaching there at 5 30 P. M., which was after shops had closed, and that car was promptly repaired on special service order the next morning, established reasonable diligence in repairing car—Leo Lococo's Sons v Louisville & N R. Co., 82 S W 2d 332, 259 Ky 299

Causal connection between delay and excusing circumstances

(1) Finding that delay in transportation of shipment of cattle was not shown to be caused by any strike in railroad shops held supported by evidence—Wichita Valley Ry. Co v. Baldwin, Tex Civ App, 270 S W. 1089.

(2) It being incumbent on carrier in suit against it for damages to cattle through alleged negligent delay in transit to show that delay in transportation was proximately caused by strike, evidence that shopmen's strike began three months before shipment in question, but not showing to what extent it affected movement of trains, does not sufficiently show causal connection between strike and delay.—Wichita Valley Ry Co v. Davis, Tex Civ App, 275 S.W. 169

7. Evidence held sufficient to show an express oral contract between plaintiff and defendant railroad to transport chestnuts to destination in time for the Christmas market.—John Vittucci Co. v. Canadian Pac Ry Co, 174 P. 981, 102 Wash. 686

Notice to carrier's agent

Evidence sustained finding, in shipper's action for damages for delay, that carrier's agent was informed of shipper's intention to have cars arrive at destination at particular time—Missouri & N. A Ry Co v. Potts, 10 S W.2d 515, 178 Ark 334.

Special limitation provision

Evidence in an action for damages for delay of a shipper that he signed one of the contracts for shipment and the other was signed by his agent, and that he has been engaged in shipping cattle about six years and has had in his possession contracts of this character signed by him in duplicate when shipping cattle, does not establish that he assented to the restrictions of the carrier's liability contained in such contracts—Banks v. Hines, 217 Ill.App. 596

8. Notice of claim

In suit for delay in shipment of cattle, letter from road's superintendent of freight loss admitting that a claim was filed concerning the shipment, treating matter as though notice required by the shipping contract had been given in proper time, held sufficient evidence of notice in market value of the shipment,[9] or to show a decline in the market,[10] or the giving of notice of special damages,[11] or to establish other factual elements of the case.[12]

It has been held that where a case is tried by the court without a jury and the declaration of law is confined to a demurrer and judgment is given to plaintiff where the carrier has conceded the delay and excuses it on the ground of a government wartime preference, such excuse must be conclusively established under the rule that any substantial evidence in plaintiff's favor will justify the judgment.[13]

Possession of receipt. It has been held that the possession of a receipt by the shipper is but prima facie evidence, in an action for delay, of his assent to stipulations contained therein.[14]

Weight and sufficiency of evidence in actions for loss or injury generally see infra § 256.

§ 219. - · Trial

a. Questions of law or fact
b. Instructions
c. Verdict

a. Questions of Law or Fact

Where the evidence is conflicting and sufficient to go to the jury, questions of fact are for its determination.

If the evidence is in dispute[15] and is sufficient to due time—McFall v. St. Louis & S F. R. Co, Mo App, 185 S.W. 1157.

9. Evidence held to establish the market value of cotton as basis for general damage for failure to ship promptly—Yazoo & M V. R Co. v. Ussery, 127 So 269, 157 Miss. 383, overruling suggestions of error 126 So 16, 157 Miss 383

Evidence held insufficient to show market value of cattle at destination when they would have arrived had they been transported without negligence.—Texas & P Ry. Co. v. Boaz, Tex Civ.App, 22 S.W.2d 492.

Evidence warranted finding that damages for delay in transporting eggs was difference between market price when delivered and market price when car should have arrived, with interest—Beatrice Creamery Co. v Missouri Pac. R Co., 247 Ill.App. 325.

10. Market report

In action for negligent delay in shipment of a carload of cattle, evidence of a market report showing that heifers of similar kind to those shipped sold at eleven dollars fifty cents and twelve dollars per hundredweight on December 16, and that the cattle shipped by plaintiffs sold the next day for eleven dollars, was evidence of a decline in the market—Marsh v. Davis, Mo.App, 251 S W. 390.

11. Conversation with carrier

In action by jobbing company against express company for damages resulting from alleged negligent delay in shipping a consignment of hats, as respects admissibility thereof, evidence that express truck was sent to jobbing company on afternoon of same day on which alleged telephonic conversation was had with express company relative to the shipment sustained finding that such conversation had actually taken place—Southeastern Express Co v. Bowers, Inc, Tenn.App., 109 S W 2d 851.

12. Agency of employees of other railroad

In an action against a carrier for delay in loading and shipping sheep, which were loaded on the cars by employees of another railroad who used the same yards and pens, evidence held sufficient to sustain a presumed finding by the trial judge that the relation of principal and agent existed between defendant carrier and the employees of the other railroad, the issue not having been submitted to the jury.—Panhandle & S F Ry. Co. v. Mayhugh, Tex Civ App., 235 S W. 915.

Avoidance of loss at market

In an action against an express company for damages for delay in delivery of shipment of eggs which the shipper asserted resulted from a fall in market, evidence held not to show conclusively that the broker to whom the eggs were assigned by promptness could have obtained the same price as had the shipment been delivered seasonably and thus avoided the fall in market—Edwards v. American Ry. Express Co., Mo.App, 216 S.W. 781.

Contract to ship corpse

In an action, by a relative of deceased, for damages for delay and deviation in the route of transportation of a corpse, evidence held to establish a contract between defendant and plaintiff, although the ticket purchased for plaintiff, who was to accompany the corpse, was purchased by her brother, and to establish that such brother was acting in her behalf—Lancaster v. Mebane, Tex Civ. App., 260 S W. 256.

Fraud or oppression

In action for delay in shipment of live stock, evidence held insufficient to show fraud or oppression relieving shipper from compliance with special contract.—St Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Taliaferro, 156 P. 359, 56 Okl. 519.

Preparedness for shipment

Evidence, in an action for delay in transporting live stock, held to sustain a finding that the cattle were ready to be loaded, in accordance with an arrangement with the carrier, at the time of the departure of the train.—Blackwell v Oregon Short Line Ry. Co, 161 P. 565, 82 Or. 303.

Rerouting

Evidence held sufficient to establish a demand on the part of a shipper that a shipment of cattle, delayed because of a strike, be diverted to another route, and that, if the request had been granted, there would have been no further delay and injury would not have resulted—Chicago, R I & P. R Co v. Dawson, 248 S.W. 558, 157 Ark. 460.

Reconsignment

In a shipper's action for damages against a carrier for its failure to exercise ordinary care in bringing about a diversion and reconsignment of three carloads of potatoes, in that the reconsignment orders were given by mail instead of by wire, whereby the shipment was delayed, loss through falling markets resulting, evidence held insufficient to show that defendant was in possession of the shipment at the time the reconsignment orders were given to its alleged agent.—Cicardi Bros Fruit & Produce Co. v. Pennsylvania Co., 249 S W. 134, 211 Mo App 589

Weight as basis for damage

Evidence held to establish weight of cotton as basis for damage for failure to ship promptly—Yazoo & M V R. Co v. Ussery, 127 So 269, 157 Miss 383, overruling suggestions of error 126 So 16, 157 Miss 383.

14. Wis—Strohn v Detroit, etc, R Co, 21 Wis. 554, 94 Am D. 564.

15. Conflicting evidence

(1) Conflicting evidence as to whether there was delay in transportation of live stock makes case for the jury—Missouri Pac. R Co v. Block, 218 S W. 682, 142 Ark. 127, justify its submission to the jury,[16] the question as to what is a reasonable time for the transportation,[17] the actual time of the arrival of the goods at their destination,[18] whether or not there was a delivery within such reasonable time[19] or there was certiorari denied 40 S.Ct. 586, 253 U.S. 493, 64 L.Ed. 1029.

(2) Where, in shipper's action against carrier, evidence was conflicting on issue whether watermelons shipped had been delivered or tendered to consignee within reasonable time, it was error to direct verdict.—Flowers v. Georgia Northern Ry. Co., 122 S.E. 647, 32 Ga.App. 52.

(3) In an action for negligent delay in the shipment of stock, where the published schedules of the carrier are not introduced in evidence, and where there is a conflict of evidence as to the schedule time, the question as to the time in which the stock was to be transported is for the jury.—Rose v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 197 N.W. 952, 111 Neb. 783.

Evidence being susceptible of more than one inference, the question whether a carrier failed to transport goods with reasonable dispatch was for the jury.—Van Epps v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 89 S.E. 1035, 105 S.C. 406.

Directed verdict for undisputed evidence

(1) In railroad shipper's suit for damages from delay in delivery of cattle, court should have directed verdict for railroad under undisputed evidence showing that the cattle reached their destination as soon as possible.—Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Gilsinger, 35 S.W.2d 1003, 183 Ark. 371.

(2) In action against railroads for negligent delay in transportation of cattle, in which the railroad's testimony that the delay at a certain point where cars were inspected and switched was a reasonable delay was not contradicted although plaintiff's agent accompanied the shipment, and there was no testimony to prove that delay at other points was not necessary to comply with U.S.Comp.St. § 8651, forbidding confinement of live stock in same cars for a longer period than thirty-six hours without unloading them for rest, water, and feeding for at least five consecutive hours, the court would have been warranted in peremptorily instructing the jury to return a verdict for the railroad.—Wilkins v. Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co., Tex.Civ.App., 260 S.W. 214.

No dispute as to reasonable time

Where the facts were not in dispute, what constituted reasonable time for delivery of shipment by railroad to the consignee was a question of law.—Lazarus v. New York Cent. R. Co., C.C.A.N.Y., 299 F. 599, certiorari denied 45 S.Ct. 95, 266 U.S. 612, 69 L.Ed. 467.

(5) Unnecessary delay.—Stewart Poultry Co. v. Erie R. Co., 163 P. 448, 99 Kan. 540.

Demurrer to evidence

In an action for delay in the shipment of live stock, where the evidence tended to show that plaintiffs, as joint owners, shipped seven carloads of cattle to market under a thirty-six hour release, and that one carload was unloaded and fed en route within thirty-six hours, and that six carloads were neither unloaded nor fed, and were forty-four hours on the way, and that there was a significant shrinkage in the weight, an order overruling a demurrer to the evidence was not erroneous.—Abell v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 222 P. 91, 115 Kan. 132.—10 C.J. p. 305 note 61.

Evidence insufficient for submission to jury

(1) Negligent delay.

Mo.—Bland v. Chicago & A. R. Co., App., 232 S.W. 232.

Okl.—Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co. v. White, 41 P.2d 847, 170 Okl. 646.

(2) In action for delay in delivery of live stock shipment, where there was no testimony of any contract by the carrier to transport the shipment to place of its destination, the court erred in submitting that issue to the jury and authorizing a recovery thereon.—Ft. Worth & R. G. Ry. Co. v. Jones, Tex.Civ.App., 212 S.W. 552.

Evidence not warranting peremptory charge

Reasonableness of schedule

While the reasonableness of schedules adopted by a railroad corporation may in certain cases present a jury question, in a shipper's action against a carrier for delay in transporting a carload of hogs court erred in allowing jury to determine whether or not the schedules in force were reasonable, since only question in the case was whether car was delivered with reasonable dispatch in accordance with train schedules in force.—Wallace-Farmer v. Davis, Iowa, 199 N.W. 307.

a delay,[20] and whether such delay was unreasonable[21] or negligent,[22] is for the determination of the jury. The existence or nonexistence of a special agreement between the shipper and the carrier is also for the determination of the jury.[23]

Excuse for delay. If there is sufficient[24] conflicting[25] evidence to justify its submission to the jury, the issue of the reasonableness and sufficiency of the excuse which the carrier makes for delay[26] is for the determination of the jury, under proper

After notice of diversion

In shippers' action against railroad for damage caused by delay in transporting perishable vegetables, whether there was an unreasonable delay by carrier in making shipment after notice of diversion was received held for jury.—Carter v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 192 S.E. 624, 184 S.C. 414.

Perishables

What is unreasonable delay in the shipment of perishable goods is a question for the jury.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Farmers' Produce Co., 85 So. 578, 17 Ala.App. 388.

Delay in starting shipment

It cannot be said, as a matter of law, that a carrier was not negligent in keeping sheep in cars overnight and forwarding them on the first regular train leaving after they were loaded; evidence of such matter simply raises an issue of fact for the jury.—Panhandle & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Mayhugh, Tex.Civ.App., 235 S.W. 915.

Negligence in discovering address

Although part of goods delivered to express company were wrongly addressed to Philadelphia, instead of Chester, Pa., where shipping receipt of which carrier had copy contained correct address, but goods were not delivered until about six months after they should have been delivered, if properly addressed, it was a question for the jury whether carrier was negligent in discovering proper address and making delivery.—American Ry. Express Co. v. Ewing Thomas Converting Co., C.C.A.Pa., 292 F. 335.

23. Ga.—Powell v. Seaboard Air Line Ry. Co., 90 S.E. 980, 19 Ga.App. 91.

Delivery irrespective of demurrage

In an action against a carrier for delay in shipment on which there were demurrage charges, held that question whether there was an agreement between carrier and consignee to deliver all its shipments without regard to any freight or demurrage that might be charged against same was for the jury.—Powell v. Seaboard Air Line Ry., 90 S.E. 980, 19 Ga.App. 91.

Scheduled time

In an action for damages for delay, whether the carrier specially contracted to move the freight by its scheduled train, promising to run it on schedule time, was for the jury.—Auditorium Theatre Co. v. Oregon-Washington R. & Navigation Co., 137 P. 489, 77 Wash. 277.

24. Peremptory instruction not required

In action by consignee against a carrier for damages for failure to notify plaintiff of arrival of bales of cotton sheeting, testimony that no notice had been received held to support verdict for plaintiffs, as against contention that peremptory instruction for defendant should have been given.—St. Louis Southwestern Ry. Co. v. T. F. Moody & Co., 268 S.W. 14, 167 Ark. 678.

25. Where uncontroverted evidence clearly proves the issue, the question may be treated as one of law and passed on by the court without any encroachment on the province of the jury.—Purity Ice Cream & Dairy Co. v. Adams Express Co., 187 N.W. 296, 217 Mich. 593—10 C.J. p. 306 note 65.

Notice of congestion

In stock shipper's action against railway for damages to cattle shipped, whether the railway in the exercise of ordinary care should have given the shipper information as to the probable congestion and inability to handle the cattle promptly at the point of destination, upon which he might not have made the shipment at all, or might have unloaded his cattle in transit for food and water, held for the jury.—Galveston, H. & S. A. Ry. Co. v. Buck, Tex.Civ.App., 230 S.W. 891.

Strike

(1) Whether there was a strike, as claimed by a carrier, delaying transportation of cattle, held for the jury.
Iowa.—Stillman v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 192 N.W. 860, 196 Iowa 612.
Mo.—Warner v. St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co., 274 S.W. 90, 218 Mo.App. 314.

(2) Whether strike was unavoidable held for jury.—Warner v. St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co., supra.

(3) Whether carrier has exercised reasonable diligence to counteract effect of strike of employees is question of fact.—Ritchie v. Oregon Short Line R. Co., 244 P. 580, 42 Idaho 193, 45 A.L.R. 909.

(4) Whether defendant carrier exercised ordinary care and diligence to supply substitutes for striking employees held for the jury.—Panhandle & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Thompson, instructions from the court. Likewise the existence of a custom excusing the carrier from its common-law duty to deliver within a reasonable time is a question for the jury.[27]

Injury and damages. Questions of fact relating to plaintiff's injury and damage suffered are properly submitted to the jury[28] where the evidence is sufficient to justify its submission.[29] Whether the delay was the proximate cause of the injury complained of is a question for the jury.[30] Likewise, whether the negligence of the shipper or his agent contributed to the injury complained of is a question of fact for the jury.[31]

Whether the damages sought to be recovered were within the contemplation of the parties at the time of the making of the contract for transportation is a question for the jury.[32] This, however, is not so where the testimony with regard to the notice given the carrier is incontrovertible and is clear and distinct,[33] or where it is insufficient for submission to the jury;[34] it is then a question of law for the court.[35]

Questions of law and fact in actions for loss or injury generally see infra § 258.

b. Instructions

Instructions in actions of this kind are governed by the rules regulating instructions in civil cases generally.

The rules governing instructions in civil actions generally apply in actions to recover damages alleged to have been caused by an unreasonable delay in transportation. Accordingly the instructions giv-

Necessity for treatment

(1) Under the evidence in actions for expenses and damages from the taking of unnecessary treatment for hydrophobia in consequence of the defendant express company's delay in delivering the head of the suspected dog to the institute for examination, the question whether the treatment was unnecessary was for the jury.—Miller v. Southern Express Co., 83 S.E. 449, 99 S.C. 333.

(2) That the evidence in actions for expenses and damages from the taking of unnecessary treatment for hydrophobia in consequence of the defendant express company's delay in delivering the head of the suspected dog to an institute for examination was conflicting on whether the dog had rabies could not preclude submission of the case to the jury—Miller v. Southern Express Co., supra.

(3) Where the evidence was conflicting as to whether the proper course is to commence treatment at once, such question was for the jury.—Miller v. Southern Express Co., supra.

29. Evidence held sufficient to go to jury

(1) Money expended for extra feed for cattle because of railroad's negligent delay in transportation.—Lide & Laney v. Texas & P. Ry. Co, Tex.Civ App., 27 S.W.2d 836.

(2) Shrinkage.—Wallace v. Gerlach, Tex.Civ.App., 249 S.W. 895.

(3) Evidence held sufficient to make question for jury whether sickness and death of horses shipped by defendant express company was natural and probable result of negligent delay in transit.—Plass v. Barrett, 168 N.Y.S. 107, 181 App Div. 131.

Evidence held insufficient to go to jury

(2) Shrinkage.—Midland Valley R Co v. Price, 260 P. 26, 127 Okl. 106.

No evidence of true measure

In an action against a carrier for losses resulting from delayed shipment, where there was no evidence on the true measure of damages, it was error to submit the case to the jury.—Keeney v. Chicago, B. & Q. R Co, 167 N.W. 475, 183 Iowa 522.

Negligent delay not explained

(1) In an action for delay in a shipment of hogs, in which there was evidence of minor delays which were explained and were not unusual, an instruction in favor of plaintiffs if the hogs were "negligently delayed" without informing jury what was meant by words "negligently delayed" held erroneous.—Howell v. Davis, Mo.App., 236 S.W. 889.

(2) In an action for negligent delay in transporting live stock, an instruction as to the burden of proving negligent delay, and that proof of delay alone was not sufficient to establish negligence, but authorizing the jury to infer negligence from facts and circumstances proved in evidence, was erroneous, where the jury were not told what facts and circumstances constituted negligence —Neely v. Hines, Mo.App., 237 S.W. 906

37. Affirmative form required

In action for delay in transporting live stock, defendant's contention, supported by evidence, that after arrival of shipment at connecting point it repaired defective cars and delivered to connecting road as quickly as possible should have been submitted to jury in affirmative form.—Ft. Worth & D C Ry Co v. Gatewood, Civ.App., 185 S.W. 932, affirmed Gatewood v. Ft Worth & D. C. Ry. Co., 232 S.W. 493, 111 Tex. 291.

Inaccurate terminology

In shipper's action for delay in transporting stallions, instruction on measure of damages held unfortunate in use of term "market price" rather than "market value."—Elliott v Chicago, M & St. P. Ry. Co., 161 N.W. 347, 38 S.D. 371.

Instructions held to be correct or not erroneous

(1) In an action against an express company for delay in transportation, charge held proper as simply meaning that defendant was liable for an unreasonable delay.—Piero v. Southern Express Co., 88 S.E. 269, 103 S.C. 467.

(2) In an action for damages resulting from delay in transporting a trainload of cattle, an instruction that in determining the question of transportation with reasonable dispatch the jury were to take in consideration all the circumstances affecting movement of the train held correct and properly given—Colson v Midland Valley R. Co., 215 P. 1004, 113 Kan. 667.

(3) Instruction on duty of carrier to maintain its tracks, etc., to withstand ordinary floods held not error. —Ft. Worth & D. C Ry. Co v Atterberry, Tex.Civ.App., 190 S.W. 1133.

(4) In action for negligent delay in transportation of live stock, under bill of lading providing for transportation "with reasonable dispatch," charge submitting question of whether the stock was accepted for "immediate transportation" held not erroneous, in view of construction of 'immediate" with reference to shipment as meaning with "reasonable promptitude" or within "reasonable time," although use of term "reasonable time" or "reasonable dispatch" would have been more accurate.—Central of Georgia Ry. Co v. Griner & Rustin, 127 S.E. 878, 33 Ga.App. 705.

(5) In shipper's action against carrier for injury to freight from unreasonable delay, instruction was proper that carrier was bound to exercise extraordinary diligence.—Atlantic Coast Line R. Co v. Tifton Produce Co., 194 S.E. 72, 56 Ga.App. 776.

Instructions held incorrect or erroneous

(1) Instruction that the reasonable time for transportation is the time consumed under ordinary circumstances is error—Dawson Bros. v. Chicago, B & Q. R. Co., Mo.App., 194 S.W. 743.

(2) It is error to instruct with reference to railroad's duty to ship by a shorter route than the one specified in the bill of lading—Illinois Cent. R. v. Luther, 283 S.W. 1013, 214 Ky. 658.

(3) Instruction that, if jury found defendant failed to transport live stock within reasonable time, burden was on defendant to prove failure was not due to negligence, held erroneous as applied to interstate shipment—Fairley v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., Mo.App., 32 S.W.2d 109

(4) Instruction that evidence that cattle were not transported in time ordinarily required warranted inference of carrier's negligence unless otherwise shown held erroneous, where shipment was interstate— Smothers v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., Mo.App., 15 S.W.2d 884.

(5) It is error to instruct that if special contract was made it could not be construed as assuming other than usual obligations of the carrier, but that, if it was the intention to extend extra facilities, the contract was void and illegal as discriminatory.—Hill v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co., 161 N.W. 444, 179 Iowa 406.

Not misleading

In action for negligent delay in shipment of a carload of cattle, where there was but one delay proved, which defendant explained in a manner consistent with the exercise of due care on its part, an instruction submitting generally the matter of delay was not misleading, in that it did not point out or define what would constitute negligence or any facts necessary to be found to convict defendant thereof—Marsh v. Davis, Mo.App., 251 S.W. 390.

Not prejudicial

In action for damages to interstate shipment from negligent delay, charge on presumption and burden of proof held not prejudicial, when considered as a whole, as ruling that mere delay tended to show negligence.—Van Epps v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 89 S.E. 1035, 105 S.C. 406.

Inapplicable instruction

In an action for delay in transporting a carload of hogs, instruction on carrier's liability for negligent handling was inapplicable under the evidence and should not have been given—Wallace-Farmer v. Davis, Iowa, 199 N.W. 307.

Pleadings supporting instruction

(1) Where carrier's answer set up a strike as a defense to an action for damages for delay in shipping cattle, the allegations stood denied as a matter of law and supported an in-exclude from the jury's consideration issues which there is evidence tending to support.[40] Requested instructions, on matters not already covered, which correctly state the law and are applicable to, and supported by, the evidence should be given,[41] but erroneous, misleading, or inapplicable instructions or instructions already covered by other charges are properly refused.[42] In instructing on the carrier's liability as such, the court should avoid imposing on it too high a degree of liability.[43] It is the duty of the court to instruct the jury correctly on the measure of damages.[44] Merely limiting the total struction notwithstanding the failure of the reply to negative the allegations.—Stillman v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 192 N.W. 860, 196 Iowa 612.

(2) In action by consignor against carrier for negligent delay, negligent icing and packing of shipment in improper car, instructions held not erroneous as being unsupported and unlimited by the declaration.—Norfolk Southern R. Co. v. Norfolk Truckers' Exchange, 88 S.E. 318, 118 Va. 650.

(3) Where, in an action against a carrier for damages based on shrinkage in weight of sheep alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligent delay in transporting shipment, plaintiff's claim for damages was based on the allegation that fifty lambs were damaged by being trampled and in bad condition, instruction that, if the delay caused more culls, jury could allow for the extra culls, held not to require reversal on the theory the instruction was broader than the pleadings, since, if the lambs were in bad condition, they would be culled.—Prebe v. Where owner relied on and showed delay, instruction not including the duty of the carrier to transport live stock within a reasonable time was error.—Bloecher & Schaaf v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 160 A. 281, 162 Md. 463.

41. Refusal of requested instruction erroneous

(1) In an action by shippers of live stock for delay in transit, where the shipment was interstate and required at least sixty hours to make, it is error for the court to refuse a correct requested instruction concerning the requirements of the federal law as to the unloading of cattle for resting, watering, and feeding.—International & G. N. Ry. Co. v. Landa & Storey, Tex.Civ.App., 183 S.W. 384.

(2) In an action against a railroad by shippers of live stock for damages from delay in transit by loss of a market, the shippers' case being founded on negligence, a requested charge, defining negligence and fault as used in an issue submitted, should have been given.—Quanah, A. & P. Ry. Co. v. Collier, Tex.Com.App., 215 S.W. 838, reversing, Civ.App., 197 S.W. 96.

(3) Requested special charges submitting to jury whether carrier's delay in delivering cattle was caused by necessity of unloading other cattle should have been given.—Fort Worth & D. C. Ry. Co. v. Dillehay, Tex.Civ.App., 297 S.W. 487.

(4) In action by shipper who had prepaid the freight against railroads for refusal to deliver goods to shipper's buyer without payment of freight charges, in which railroads claimed the latter refused the goods because of inferior quality, and not because of railroads' demand for payment of charges and consequent delay until railroads' discovery of the mistake, it was error to refuse an instruction submitting such issue.—Russell Grain Co. v. Chicago Great Western R. Co., 237 S.W. 159, 208 Mo.App. 485.

Rest statutes
In case of an interstate shipment of live stock which required two or more days to make, the court, when requested, should instruct the jury with relation to the requirements of the federal statute as to unloading live stock for rest, water, and feed.—International, etc., R. Co. v. Landa, Tex.Civ.App., 183 S.W. 384.—10 C.J. p 307 note 81.

42. Argumentative, incorrect, and unsupported instruction
Requested charge that, if cattle arriving too late for market on date of arrival were delivered with usual dispatch, jury should not consider market values on days of arrival, even to show trend of market, held improper as on weight of evidence, argumentative, relieving defendant from duty to exercise ordinary care, and not warranted by evidence.—Galveston, H. & S. A. Ry. Co. v. Neville, Tex.Civ.App., 272 S.W. 597.

Requested instruction properly refused
(1) A requested instruction that, if shipper's failure to use refrigerator car or to order re-icing contributed to loss of spinach, the jury must find for defendant was properly refused, where evidence showed that such a car is not used for transportation of spinach.—Norfolk Southern R. Co. v. Norfolk Truckers' Exchange, 88 S.E. 318, 118 Va. 650.

(2) Court did not err in refusing instruction that carriers are not insurers of the safe delivery of the live stock at any particular time, but were bound to use only ordinary care under the circumstances of the shipment the charge given by the court being correct and adequate.—Panhandle & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Morrison, Tex.Civ.App., 191 S.W. 138.

(3) Court properly refused to instruct that "defendant is not liable for delays, if any, unless the same were due to its negligence, and if you find that delays, if any, were due to cold weather or other action of the elements, then the defendant is not liable for any damage to said stock caused by such delays as you may find were due solely to the weather," where no evidence was introduced to support it.—Rogness v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co., 196 P. 989, 59 Mont. 373

Instruction erroneous
In action for damages to interstate shipment of live stock made under contract prescribed by interstate commerce commission, instruction that carrier had duty to handle shipment expeditiously and with reasonable dispatch was error as placing an additional duty on the carrier.—Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Ridley, 249 P. 289, 119 Okl. 138.

Double measure erroneous
Instruction taking in full scope of measure of damages for negligent delay by carrier in transportation of horses, and then allowing further damages for care and services to place horses in condition fit for market, is erroneous as allowing double measure of damages.—Siegel v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 208 N.W. 78, 201 Iowa 712.

amount plaintiff may recover,[45] or merely instructing the jury to assess damages without any direction as to the rule by which such damages should be assessed,[46] is erroneous. An instruction which authorizes the recovery as damages of all the expense of handling, feeding, and watering live stock in transit is reversible error, in a case where all such expense as is not necessitated by the delay must be borne by the shipper.[47]

Instructions in actions for loss or injury generally see infra § 259.

c. Verdict

A special finding will not defeat a general verdict when they are consistent.

In an action against a carrier for delay in transporting live stock under a statute requiring transportation of such a shipment without delay and at not less than a prescribed speed, where a delay of three days was proved and the jury specially found that the carrier negligently billed the car to the wrong destination, such special finding does not defeat a general verdict for plaintiff since they are not inconsistent.[48]

§ 220. Judgment

The name of the carrier's agent, joined as defendant, should be stricken from the judgment where no cause of action was stated against him and he was ignored in the instructions.

Where an agent of defendant carrier was joined as a defendant in a suit for delay in transportation, but no cause of action was stated against him and the instructions were given as though the carrier was the sole defendant, the agent's name should be stricken from the judgment.[49]

§ 221. Damages for Delay

The damages recoverable in an action for delay in transportation are limited to those actually sustained and ascertainable from, and supported by, the evidence.

In actions for damages resulting from wrongful delay in transportation, plaintiff will ordinarily be confined to such damages as are actually sustained,[50] and which are supported by,[51] and can be ascertained from,[52] the evidence. Ordinarily, the damages recoverable are such and only such as are the proximate result of the delay, and not such as might have resulted from it.[53] Nevertheless, a pecuniary loss is not always required.[54] Conjectural, speculative, or remote damages cannot be recovered.[55] If during the negligent delay the

Shrinkage as element

In action against a carrier for damages from delay in shipment of cattle, court properly submitted shrinkage in weight of cattle as an element of damage, where there was evidence as to what the weight of the cattle should have been on the market had they been transported at the usual time, and as to what the cattle actually weighed when they were sold on the market.—Panhandle & S F. Not a penalty

The damages recoverable for a delay in delivery of a shipment are not to be identified as a penalty imposed on the carrier for his failure to deliver the goods on time.—C. L. Hils Co. v. Cincinnati, N. O & T. P. Ry. Co, 181 N E 819, 42 Ohio App. 103.

Where a shipment of cholera infected hogs was negligently delayed, thereby delaying innoculation at the destination, but the evidence showed that not more than eighty per cent of infected hogs could have been saved, failure to limit recovery against carrier for negligent delay was error.—Georgia, S. & F. Application of rule difficult

In applying the principle set out in the above text, it has been well said that the difficulty experienced by the courts is not so much in the abstract principles, but in their application to special circumstances, so multiform and various in the transactions of actual life.—Vicksburg, etc., R. Co. v. Ragsdale, 46 Miss. 458.

54. Pleasure automobile

Damages not speculative or uncertain

(1) Damages for express company's delay in delivery of picture film were neither so speculative nor special as to preclude recovery.—Diamond v. Southeastern Express Co., 128 S E. 417, 131 S C 450.

(2) Damages for loss of chance to compete for prize money are not too remote and speculative in action for delay in transporting hogs for exhibition purposes.—Kansas City, M. & O. Ry. Co. v. Bell, Tex.Civ.App., 197 S.W. 322.

market price at destination increases, the shipper is not injured and is not entitled to recover damages.[56] Where the character of a commodity is to be changed into a different commodity, affected by a different market and the prices prevailing therein, in the absence of a showing that the delay caused the transformed commodity to reach the market to the damage of the consignee, there is no damage compensation for which the carrier is liable.[57]

If no actual damages are shown, only nominal damages are recoverable,[58] and if negligent delay on the part of the carrier is shown, the shipper is in any event entitled to recover nominal damages.[59]

Where, on the consignee's refusal to accept goods because of delay, the shipper reshipped them back to the starting point under an agreement with the carrier to allow the profit lost on the shipment plus the difference between the freight rates, the fact that the goods were subsequently resold by the shipper at the regular price is immaterial in determining the loss of profits and freight charges resulting from the delay.[60]

The damages should be adequate but not excessive.[61] Where, however, there is competent evidence in support of a claim for damages resulting from the delay and from a consideration of which different minds might arrive at different amounts, the damages assessed by the jury will not be held to be excessive when they are within an amount which seems to be fair and reasonable under the evidence.[62]

Special damages are discussed, see infra § 229. Damages for loss or injury generally see infra §§ 262–274.

§ 222. · · Elements and Measure in General

a. In general
b. Value of goods
c. Loss of particular market

a. In General

The proper elements and measure of damages are dependent on the nature of the goods, the purpose of the shipment, and whether or not the action sounds in contract or tort.

The proper elements and measure of damages for delay in delivery in any particular case depend somewhat on the nature of the goods shipped and the purposes for which the shipment is made. The particular elements of damages recoverable are considered infra §§ 223–228.

It has been held that where the action sounds in tort, based on the negligent failure of the carrier to transport goods to their destination within a reasonable time the measure of damages is some-

(3) Where it appeared that the cattle delayed were "feeders" bought for resale; and plaintiff, who was an experienced cattleman, testified that when they arrived they looked gaunt, had lost thirty or thirty five pounds more in weight than they would have, had they not been delayed, and were not in a salable condition when they arrived, as they had been when they were shipped, the damages were not so uncertain and speculative as to be impossible of ascertainment—Hendrix v. (2) On allegation that hogs delayed in shipment lost twenty five pounds per head and their value depreciated twenty five cents per hundredweight because thereof, verdict for more than amount of total weight lost is excessive—Kansas City, M & O Ry Co. v. Bell, Tex.Civ App, 197 S.W 322.

Damages not inadequate

In action for damages for delay in shipment of live stock, so that it brought a lower market price and shrunk in weight, verdict of fifty dollars was not so clearly inadequate as to justify setting it aside on that ground.—McArdle v. Chicago, M. & St P. Ry. Co., 165 N W. 232, 138 Minn. 379.

(2) $650, held not excessive for damage to six carloads of cattle because of shrinkage and a drop in the market due to the carrier's delay in unloading and delivering.—Petsch & McDonald v. Hines, 192 N W 963, 110 Neb. 1.

(3) $150, where a carrier delayed a shipment of forty seven head of cattle for about a day, causing them to be without feed or water, the amount being based on the testimony of a cattleman as to their shrinkage in weight, is not excessige—Chicago, R I & P Ry. Co. v. Stallings, 201 S.W. 294, 132 Ark. 446.

what different than that applicable to actions for breach of contract, the carrier being liable for all consequences which naturally flow from its wrongful act, provided they are not too remote, and if they could have been reasonably anticipated, it being immaterial whether or not they were in the contemplation of the contract of carriage or not.[63]

Elements and measure of damages in actions for loss or injury see infra § 263.

b. Value of Goods

The measure of damages for a delay in transportation is not ordinarily the value of the goods shipped unless there has been a total loss.

The measure of damages for delay in transportation is not the value of the goods, since the bailor still retains the ownership, but the loss proximately caused by the delay. The carrier's liability is to compensate for the damages growing out of the delay, and not for loss, and the remedy of the person entitled to the goods is to sue for the damages he has sustained by reason of the delay. This rule proceeds on the theory that a party injured by the breach of a contract by another should take all reasonable steps to minimize the damage he will suffer.[64] The length of the delay does not in any way affect the operation of the rule.[65] Neither does the fact that the owner of the goods has been obliged to buy other like goods affect the rule;[66] he should accept the goods and sue for the damages caused by the delay.[67] The rule is not abrogated by a statute making the carrier liable for loss or damage to goods and to a penalty for failure to adjust the claim therefor within a time limited.[68]

A stipulation for a sum per day as damages for delay does not apply to injury to the goods due to delay.[69]

In case of damage to a part of the goods only by delay there can be recovery only for such partial damage.[70]

Where loss is total. An exception to the rule occurs where because of unreasonable delay the goods become valueless, or in other words, where the delay has caused what is equivalent to a total loss, to the owner; under these circumstances a recovery of the full value of the goods when and where they should have been delivered is proper.[71]

Sale by carrier. Where a delay in the transportation of goods has caused the loss of a sale at a stipulated price, such delay will be considered to be the proximate cause of the loss to the shipper of the full value of the goods, where the carrier subsequently wrongfully sold the goods, thus preventing the shipper from selling them on the market or taking any measures to minimize the damages.[72]

c. Loss of Particular Market

The loss of a particular market due to unreasonable delay in transportation is an element of damages.

Although, as heretofore shown in § 191 b, a carrier cannot as a rule be held liable for failure to deliver a shipment in time for a particular market, nevertheless, if there is a delay caused by the negligence of the carrier, which delay deprives the shipper of the benefit of the market on a certain day,

Any reasonably anticipated damages
Tort-feasor is liable for any damages consequent on his act which are directly traceable to it if they could reasonably have been anticipated as likely to have resulted from neglect; hence in shipper's action against express company, in recovering damages for delay, shipper was not limited to interest on value of shipment during period of delay.—Southern Express Co. v. and he is damaged thereby, the loss of that market may be considered in estimating his damages.[73] General damages resulting from a delay in transporting goods to a market whereby a special sales day is lost may be recovered from the carrier, even though the goods had not been sold under a definite contract before shipment.[74] Where a shipment could not have been delivered in time for a sale on a certain day, damages for any decline of the market from that time until the time when they should have been delivered are not recoverable.[75] Where, however, a carrier contracts to deliver cattle in time for a particular market, but it fails to make delivery in time to permit the animals to be fed and watered before market, as is customary, so that they are held over for the next day's market, the carrier is liable for a loss occasioned by a decline in the market.[76]

In cases of negligent delay in delivery, market conditions and practices rather than market rule hours will govern, and the injurious consequences of delivery too late for market on the day of arrival are to be regarded as consequences of delivery for the next day's market.[77]

The measure of damages for the loss of a particular sale due to delay in delivery is considered infra § 229.

§ 223. Depreciation in Market Value Generally

a. As ordinary measure of damages
b. Goods not shipped for sale

a. As Ordinary Measure of Damages

(1) In general
(2) Intrinsic deterioration or shrinkage
(3) Seasonal goods

(1) In General

The difference between the market value of the goods at the time they should have been delivered and such value when actually delivered is a proper measure of damages for delay.

It is the general rule, so stated in Corpus Juris which has been quoted and cited as authority therefor,[78] that for unreasonable delay in the transportation of nearly all classes of goods the shipper is entitled to recover the difference between the market value of the goods at the time and place at which delivery should have been made, and their market value when delivery was actually made.[79]

In the nature of things, such damage, it is said, is deemed to have been within the contemplation of the parties at the time the contract was made, as a probable consequence of an unreasonable delay.[80]

If there is no market on the day of delivery the market value at the next available market will control.[81] If there is no market value at the destination it has been held that the market price at the nearest place where there is a market for the quality specified will control.[82] It has also been held that if by reason of the delay there is no market value for the goods at their destination and in consequence they are shipped to another market, the measure is the difference in market value at destination when they should have arrived and what they sold for on the market to which they were shipped.[83] Where, however, a shipper diverted his shipment to another market with the carrier's consent, and it was undisputed that the same facilities would have been furnished for shipment to the second market and that the damage to the shipment was caused by failure to ice the car before loading, the measure of damages should be based on the market value at the destination to which the car was finally sent, not that at the original destination, since the shipper was entitled to the benefit of his right to reship to a better market.[84] Where a railway agent at the point to which goods were consigned agrees to send a car containing them, as soon as it arrives, to another point, thus changing their destination to the latter point, the measure of damages for delay in holding the car at the original destination is the difference in values at the changed destination.[85] Where the value of the goods where they were manufactured is shown and when it is also shown that such goods were shipped all over the country from the point of manufacture, it has been held to be a fair deduction that the goods are at least of the same value at the point of destination and plaintiff's damages may be ascertained therefrom.[86]

Depreciation in value of goods in actions for loss or injury generally see infra § 264.

Amount paid for, or brought by, goods. The general rule heretofore stated applies with full force and effect, irrespective of the amount paid for the goods; and it is of no importance whether the price was too low or that it was exorbitant.[87]

Live stock

(1) The measure of damages for unreasonable delay in the delivery of a shipment of live stock is the difference in the market value of such stock at the time when it was actually delivered and at the time it should have been delivered.

(2) Where carrier was negligent in unloading and delaying a shipment of cattle at a certain intermediate point until its freight traffic, interrupted by a strike, could be resumed to their destination, treatment of the cattle at such point becomes immaterial, and the general rule as to the measure of damages for the delay applies.—Panhandle & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Thompson, Tex.Civ.App., 235 S.W. 913, dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

Exclusive measure

In the absence of a special contract the measure of damages for delay set out in the above text, with interest less unpaid freight, is exclusive.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Bunch, 102 S.E. 462, 25 Ga.App. 45.

No change by statute

Amendment to Interstate Commerce Act providing liability for full actual loss leaves measure of damages same as it was at common law.—Wood & Co. v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 151 N.E. 229, 320 Ill. 341, reversing 236 Ill.App. 595.

Valuation in claim

A shipper is not bound by the valuation stated by him in the claim filed with the express company especially where he stated he placed a reduced value in the claim upon the articles to procure an immediate settlement.—Southern Express Co. v. Couch, 249 S.W. 559, 157 Ark. 604

Where limited liability clause is void

Damages is the common-law measure, namely, the value of the shipment at point of destination, when it should have been delivered, where clause in bill of lading, limiting liability, was void under Cummins Amendment.—Davis v. Hunter, 138 N.E. 785, 79 Ind.App. 462.

Wholesale market

If a wholesale shipment is involved and there is no wholesale market at the place where the shipment should have been delivered, it has been held that the actual value of the shipment at the nearest wholesale market may be considered.—American Ry. Nevertheless, where the only evidence tending to show that the goods had a market value at their destination when they should have been delivered greater than the price at which they were sold by plaintiff consignor, after the buyer had refused to accept them, was the sale made by plaintiff to the consignee, the court may assume that the sale to the consignee was at market price.[88] Proof of the actual sale price of the goods after delivery is unnecessary.[89]

Contract for delivery within specified time. It is of no importance whether or not the carrier had undertaken specially to deliver by a fixed day, as this is a matter which affects merely the liability of the company and not the measure of damages recoverable.[90]

Special agreement as to damages in case of loss. The rule also applies, notwithstanding a stipulation in the bill of lading that, in the event of loss of property, the value of the same at the point of shipment shall govern, inasmuch as the stipulation refers to property lost in transit and not to property damaged by the delay of the carriers.[91]

Shipment to foreign country. The fact that the goods are shipped to a foreign country where a different standard of money prevails does not affect the operation of the rule, but the standard of the United States must be taken in both places as the measure of value in money.[92]

Where goods are returned to place of shipment from the point of destination because of refusal to receive them, and the shipper is not promptly notified of the return, the measure of damages is the difference in the value of the shipment at the time and the place it ought to have been delivered and its value at the time when plaintiff was notified of its return.[93]

Delays for different periods of time. Where two portions of a shipment are delayed and one longer than the other, and a profit is made on the one portion in consequence of the delay, it should be deducted from the loss sustained as to the other part by reason of the delay.[94]

(2) Intrinsic Deterioration or Shrinkage

The general measure of damages applies whether the damage results from market decline, intrinsic deterioration, shrinkage, or a combination of these causes.

The rule that the measure of damages is the difference between the market value of the goods at the time when delivery should have been made and the market value when and where delivery was actually made applies whether the damages result from a decline in the market, or from intrinsic deterioration, shrinkage, or a combination of these causes.[95] Thus, if injury to the goods results from unreasonable delay in transportation, the shipper may recover not only the depreciation caused by a decline in the market value thereof at the time they were delivered and that at the time they should have been delivered, but he is entitled also to recover damages for the injury to the goods.[96]

The measure of damages for delay of a shipment of live stock is the difference between its value at the time and place of delivery in an uninjured condition and its value in the depreciated condition in which it was actually delivered.[97] It has been held that, if there is no difference in the market value at the time the stock was delivered and that at the time it should have been delivered, plaintiff can recover only for the injury to its fitness for market resulting from the delay, and the cost of feeding and caring for it during the

Selling delayed shipment with another

Where cattle composing two shipments were worth one dollar per head less on the market when they reached their destination than they would have been, had they arrived at the time and in the condition they would have been, had it not been for defendant's negligence, the mingling of the cattle and selling both shipments together was not prejudicial to defendant, in an action for damages sustained by the delay in shipment, as the damages would have been the same, had the shipments been sold separately.—Gulf, W. T. & P. Ry. Co. v. McCampbell, Civ. App., 85 S.W. 1158, modifying 85 S.W. 854.

delay.[98] It has uniformly been held that shrinkage in weight due to the delay is a proper element of damage to be allowed.[99] Furthermore, if the negligent delay caused a loss of weight and this loss caused the remaining weight to be worth less on the market than it would otherwise have been, both the value of the lost weight and the depreciation of the remaining weight are proper elements of damage.[1] It has also been held that where a negligent delay in delivering live stock resulted in the loss of the market on the day of arrival as there was no time to shape it for market on that day, the proper measure of damages is the difference between the market value, had it arrived without delay or injury and the market value on the first market after its arrival for which it could be prepared by the exercise of reasonable diligence.[2]

Damages may be allowed for other physical injuries than shrinkage resulting from the delay.[3] Where some of the live stock were dead when the shipment arrived at its destination due to a negligent delay at an intermediate point, the measure of the shipper's damage for the dead animals is their market value on arrival had no delay occurred.[4] If a carrier negligently delayed a shipment of live stock, any damage suffered by the stock by reason of being placed in the sun in a badly ventilated place while being moved is recoverable as an item of damages regardless of whether the carrier was negligent in so placing the stock; if, however, the delay was not caused by the carrier's negligence it is not liable for injury to the stock by being so placed unless it was negligent in so placing the stock.[5]

Live stock shipped to pasture. When cattle are transported to pasture or feeding pens to prepare them for market, the proper measure of damages for loss in weight occasioned by the actionable delay of the carrier has been held to be the expense of reproducing the weight lost by reason of the delay, market value rule not being pertinent[6]

Stipulation or special contract. Where it is stipulated that any recovery is to be based on value at the place of shipment, it has been held that damages for delay and consequent deterioration are to be measured by the difference of value due to that cause, not exceeding the value at the place of shipment.[7] It has also been held that, where the parties contract that the amount of the loss shall be computed on the value of the property at the place and time of shipment, the shipper can recover for loss from delay only the difference between such value and the salvage price plus any charges paid.[8]

(3) Seasonal Goods

Unusual loss from delay in carrying seasonal goods is not recoverable as general damages.

General damage through the carrier's delay in delivering freight cannot become special damage because of unusual loss caused by the delay in carrying seasonal goods and does not create an exception to the ordinary or market-value rule.[9] The term "market value" in determining the measure of damages for depreciation in the value of seasonal goods delayed in transportation has however been held to mean the price at which such merchandise would sell in the open market, in quantities as shipped, at the point of destination.[10]

b. Goods Not Shipped for Sale

It is a general, but not universal, rule that the fact that goods are not shipped for sale or for immediate sale does not alter the rule as to the measure of damages for delay. The rental value during period of delay, of machinery or tools shipped for use is generally regarded as the proper measure of damages for their unreasonable delay.

While in the majority of cases in which the general rule, stated above in subdivision a, was announced the goods unreasonably delayed were shipped for sale, the rule ordinarily applies whether property is shipped to market or held for some other purpose, or whether it is intended for immediate sale or not;[11] thus the fact that live stock was shipped for exhibition rather than for immediate sale does not affect the application of this general rule.[12] In some jurisdictions, however, an exception to the rule allowing as damages for unreasonable delay the difference between the market value of the goods at the time they are delivered and their market value at the time they should have been delivered is recognized in a number of decisions in the case of goods not intended for market but for some special purpose of the owner;[13] and it has been held that where the consignee does not expect or intend to sell on delivery but intends to store the goods for better prices the general rule as to the measure of damages does not apply.[14] As shown below, this exception is applicable particularly to machinery and tools, and to household goods and wearing apparel, see infra § 225.

Machinery and implements. The measure of damages for unreasonable delay in transportation of machinery, in the absence of notice of special damages, is its rental value during the time it was improperly delayed, or, in other words, the value of its use to the owner;[15] and to this may be added such reasonable expense as may be incurred by the shipper in making a search for the goods or in endeavoring to secure delivery.[16] It is said that a loss of the use of machinery during the time delivery was delayed is the natural and proximate result flowing from the delay.[17] Rental value is properly allowed as the measure of damages for an automobile intended to be used for pleasure only, even though the evidence discloses that plaintiff did not hire another automobile except an occasional taxi.[18] There is authority, however, to the effect that loss of rental value is a special damage for which notice must have been given if it is to be recovered.[19]

Where the carrier admits unreasonable delay in the shipment of implements, which were not damaged, and no fluctuation occurred in their market value, the shipper has been held to be entitled to recover only their reasonable rental value for the time of the unreasonable delay.[20]

§ 224. Depreciation in Market Value between Time of Arrival and Time of Sale

No recovery is allowed for depreciation occurring after the goods arrived and could have been sold.

Where goods have unreasonably been delayed there can be no recovery for depreciation in market value occurring after the time the goods actually arrived and could have been sold,[21] nor after such time can there be any recovery for the expense of keeping the goods, or for shrinkage in weight, or depreciation in actual value.[22]

Generally, where there is a market for live stock upon arrival after a negligent delay by the carrier, the shipper must sell immediately, whereupon he can recover the difference between the price received and what the shipment would have brought except for the delay; he may not hold the shipment over and speculate on a better price; but this rule, presupposes a fair or reasonable market or a fair opportunity to sell and the shipper need not sell a delayed shipment immediately upon arrival unless there is such a fair opportunity to sell.[23]

§ 225. Household Goods and Wearing Apparel

The rental value during period of delay is the measure for household goods. As to goods without rental value, such as clothing, the reasonable value of the use is the proper measure.

The rule stated in Corpus Juris quoted with approval,[24] is that, where goods are not intended for the market, but are household goods intended to serve some specific purpose of the owner, the measure of damages for delay in transportation is, as often held, the rental value of the goods during the period of delay.[25]

If the goods consist of clothing, or similar domestic or household goods which cannot properly be said to have any rental value, the measure of damages is ordinarily the reasonable value of the use of the property to the owner during the time of the delay,[26] although it has been held that the carrier must have had notice of its intended use as wearing apparel by the owner or the general rule as to depreciation of market value at the place of delivery will apply.[27]

It has been held that, where delay in delivery wearing apparel renders necessary the purchase of clothing for immediate use, the measure of damages for delay in delivering the clothing shipped is the difference between the cost of that purchased and its value to the owner at the time of the delivery of the clothing delayed in shipment,[28] and that if there is no evidence to show the value, to the owner, of the clothing purchased at the time the clothing delayed in shipment was delivered, there is no basis on which damages can be awarded.[29]

§ 226. Incidental Expenses and Damages

The carrier is liable for any incidental damages proximately resulting from the delay in transportation, in addition to the depreciation in market value.

In addition to the difference between the market value of the goods at the time and place when they should have been delivered and the time and place when they were delivered, the carrier is liable for any other and incidental damages naturally and proximately flowing from such delay.[30] It is very generally held that necessary expenses incurred

No sale at next market
Where, because of a carrier's negligence, cattle shipped to the Kansas City market did not arrive in time for Thursday's market and were held over until Friday, which was a regular market day, but, the market being inactive, the cattle did not sell and were held over until Saturday, when they were shipped to another market, held that, for purposes of computing the damages resulting from shrinkage, the cattle were delivered for the Friday market, and damages for shrinkage subsequent to delivery should not be allowed, the delay having no causal relation to the inactivity of the market.—Anderson v. Atchison, T. & S F. Ry. Co., 192 P. 755, 107 Kan. 537.

Subsequent deterioration
Carrier is liable for delay of perishable produce, only for deterioration at time of delivery, and it was insufficient to show deterioration when produce was sold several days later.—Gulf, C & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Dean, Tex.Civ.App., 261 S.W 520.

No fair bids
Where cattle through carrier's negligent delay arrived too late for morning market and in afternoon commission men could not secure fair bids, shipper holding part of cattle over until following morning when lower market was encountered could recover losses from carrier.—Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Russell, Tex.Civ App., 27 S.W.2d 608.

Where there is no market for goods when delivered and the consignor uses due diligence to dispose of them and later does dispose of them at the best price obtainable, such delay will not affect his right to maintain an action for damages due to delay in transportation by carrier.—L. A question of a witness as to what was the depreciation of a fur scarf during the time of delay should have called for the market value of the fur at the place of delivery at the time it should have been delivered and the market value there when actually delivered if the defendant had no notice at the time of shipment that it was intended for wearing apparel of the owner—American Ry. by the owner of the goods on account of negligent delay of the carrier in delivering them at their destination may be recovered;[31] this is in accordance with the well settled principle that one who is injured by the negligence of another is bound to use all reasonable means at his command to lessen the damages which would otherwise result from such negligence,[32] and he cannot recover damages for such loss as might have been avoided by a compliance with the rule.[33] On complying with this rule, it is only fair that he should be allowed the necessary expense to which he is put in reducing the damages.[34] Nevertheless, plaintiff is not entitled to damages for inconvenience and expense to which he was put by the delay where he offers no evidence on the subject; and under these circumstances he is entitled to only nominal damages, if to any at all, for his inconvenience and expense.[35]

In applying the foregoing principles to dead freight, it has been held that expenses incurred in securing the safety of the goods are recoverable[36] and also expense incurred in reshipping to another market, made necessary because by reason of negligent delay the original place of destination ceased to be a market for the class of goods shipped.[37]

Although it has been held that damages are not recoverable for loss of time while waiting for the goods to arrive,[38] it has been held that insurance which the shipper may have had to pay by reason of increased risk caused by the delay is recoverable,[39] as is demurrage on vessels awaiting the delayed shipment.[40] According to some decisions expenses incurred in searching for or attempting to locate the goods are recoverable[41] unless such expenditures were unreasonable or unnecessary.[42]

Expense cannot be included which might have been avoided by the exercise of reasonable care,[43] or which does not grow out of the delay.[44] Interest paid on a debt which the consignee expected to discharge by delivery of the goods is not recoverable.[45]

Where perishables are lost in packing houses and fields due to the carrier's negligent delay in the transportation of crates to be used in packing them, the measure of damages is the value of the perishables at the time and in the place where they were lost.[46]

Incidental damages in actions for loss or injury in general see infra § 266.

Retail expense. Where wholesale merchandise is shipped in bulk it is error to allow as damages the profits which it might have received above the wholesale price from a sale at retail without deducting the expense that would have been incurred in retailing the goods.[47]

Live stock. The general rule has found frequent application in respect of negligent delay in the transportation of live stock, and it is very generally held that the shipper is entitled to recover all incidental expense rendered necessary by the delay,[48] as, for instance, the expense of feeding[49] or caring

§ 227. Interest; Deduction of Freight Charges

As damages for delay in transportation the shipper is entitled to recover interest on the value of the shipment during the period of delay, but unpaid freight charges should be deducted.

The decisions in many cases in which the complaint has demanded interest hold that interest on the value of the shipment during the time of the reasonable delay is recoverable as damages,[54] although it is otherwise where interest is forbidden by statute.[55] It has been held that interest allowed by the court should not be construed as interest eo nomine but as part of the damages,[56] and it has been held that the fact that a greater rate of interest than the legal rate is demanded does not prevent a recovery of the legal rate.[57]

Unpaid freight is to be deducted from the amount of damage, as the owner receives the advantage of the transportation.[58] Likewise, where the shipper has already paid the freight charges, he is not entitled to recover them back in addition to the damages occasioned to him by the delay, as this would make him better off because of the delay than if the shipment had been made promptly.[59] Where an express shipment for which charges were paid was negligently delayed, the shipper's only claim is by way of damages and he cannot recover on the theory of money had and received, the consideration paid, or any such part of it as exceeds the reasonable value of the services rendered, namely, freight services.[60] Where, however, the consignee buyer, who refused to accept a shipment because defendant carrier did not deliver it within a reasonable time, was to pay the freight charges, consignor who sold the goods at a lower price after having paid the freight charges is entitled to have such freight paid included as damages [61]

Deducting freight charges in actions for loss or injury generally see infra § 272. Interest on damages for loss or injury generally see infra § 265.

§ 228. Exemplary or Punitive Damages

Where the carrier is guilty of reckless or wanton conduct, punitive damages have been allowed.

Exemplary or punitive damages are not recoverable for unreasonable delay in transportation, unless such delay was due to gross negligence or oppression, or to a willful, conscious, or wanton disregard of the shipper's rights.[62] Where, however, the carrier's conduct in delaying the shipments showed a reckless and wanton disregard of the shipper's rights, punitive damages are proper in jurisdiction where such damages are allowable.[63] Where an interstate shipment is involved, the federal law on the subject of punitive damages is controlling, and, where the delay of such a shipment is occasioned by acts and circumstances indicating willfulness on the part of the carrier's agents or servants, punitive damages are not recoverable therefor unless the carrier either initially authorized such acts or ratified them.[64]

a. Recovery Dependent on Notice

Special damages are not recoverable unless the carrier is informed of special circumstances rendering prompt transportation necessary, but, where it has such notice, they may be recoverable.

It is the general rule, so stated in Corpus Juris which has been cited as authority therefor,[65] that damages recoverable for delay in transportation must be such as might reasonably have been contemplated by the parties at the time the contract of carriage was made, and that special damages for delay are recoverable only in case the shipper, at or before the time he tendered his goods for shipment, informed the carrier of the special circumstances which rendered a prompt transportation and delivery of the goods at their destination necessary,[66] or if the carrier has constructive notice of the special losses which are likely to follow from

Intention to exhibit

In absence of notice that hogs are to be exhibited, carrier is not liable for loss of prize money caused by delay in transportation.—Kansas City, M. & O. Ry. Co. v. Bell, Tex. Civ.App., 197 S.W. 322.

"Special damage," as applied to delay in delivering a shipment of goods, is something other and beyond the damage occasioned by the mere difference in the market price, being an element which the carrier cannot be presumed to have knowledge of without special notice.—Bawer v. Barrett, 171 N.Y.S. 322.

the delay, as indicated infra subdivision d. The rule in its application is not limited to contracts of sale in contemplation by the shipper, but is applied to the varying phases of mercantile life, on the theory that unless the carrier be made aware by the shipper, at the time of shipment, of the urgency, and the circumstances that require unusual dispatch or care in transportation, it cannot be presumed to know the facts, the existence and knowledge of which upon its part present the legal status on which its liability for more than ordinary damages can be predicated.[67] In every instance, it is said, the shipper has it within his power to protect himself against all damages, both general and special, caused by delays or losses in shipment, by giving notice to the carrier when the contract is made; if he fails to avail himself of this privilege he must suffer the consequences of his own neglect.[68]

One reason for this rule is that the party undertaking the delivery is held to assume, when he makes his contract, a liability only for those damages which would, in the usual and ordinary course of things, result from his failure to perform, because it is only these that he is required to foresee, unless it is shown that knowledge of an unusual situation of the other party, in which extraordinary injury may be caused by nondelivery, has been brought to his attention, and that he has contracted with reference thereto; to allow other damages would be to add to the terms of the contract another element of damages not contemplated by the parties.[69] Another reason for requiring the notice is to give the carrier an opportunity to protect itself by special precaution against delay in transportation,[70] or to enable it to decline the shipment if by reason of unusual conditions it cannot transport promptly.[71] Other reasons usually assigned for the rule as applied to contracts generally, such as that the person to whom the notice is given may have an opportunity of demanding additional compensation, if he so desires, or of refusing to make the contract, have been said to have no application in carrier law, because the carrier is not at liberty to require the one or to refuse the other.[72]

When notice has been given. The rule is equally well settled, and Corpus Juris has been quoted as authority for it,[73] that special damages for delay in the shipment of goods are recoverable when the carrier has notice that a delay in delivery will result in such damages.[74] As otherwise expressed, where at the time of entering into a contract both parties knew and contemplated that, if a breach is committed, some injury will occur in addition to the natural and ordinary consequences of the breach, the person committing the breach will be liable to give compensation or damages on the occurrence of the injury.[75] Notice of special circumstances, it is said, puts on the carrier the duty to use diligence commensurate with the requirements of the case.[76] The carrier's duty, however, is fully performed when on receiving the notice it uses reasonable diligence to forward the goods promptly.[77] In the application of the rule, it is of no importance that the amount of the damages cannot be estimated at the time the contract of shipment is entered into.[78] The important consideration on which the right to recover special damages depends is not that the extent or amount of such damages was estimated by the parties, but that, when the contract was made, the fact that such special damages might follow the breach was contemplated by the parties.[79]

Agent's representations as basis for special damages. A representation by an agent of the carrier to the shipper's agent that the shipment was only a short distance away from its destination, but not stating when it would arrive, is not a representation on which may be founded any special damages for a delay.[80]

b. Time of Giving Notice

Ordinarily the notice must be given at or before the time of making the contract for shipment. In some jurisdictions, however, a notice during transit will support special damages subsequently occurring.

To render effective the notice of special circumstances, it should be given at or before the time of the making of the contract of shipment.[81] Indeed, it appears to be the general rule that a notice of the circumstances rendering prompt transportation necessary, given after the carrier has accepted the goods for transportation, does not affect the original contract and is not sufficient to fasten on the carrier a liability for special damages growing out of such circumstances on account of delay occurring during transportation.[82] In the application of the rule, it has been held to make no difference that the notice so given was given in time for the carrier to prevent the delay.[83] Thus it has been held that the notice is insufficient on which to base a recovery of special damages if it is given after the carrier's acceptance of the goods for shipment but before it has left the point of origin,[84] or after the shipment has started on its way and before it has reached its destination,[85] or after the damages have already accrued,[86] or after a reasonable time for the delivery of the goods.[87] Where, however, the breach consists in the failure to make delivery after the shipment reaches its destination, and when nothing remains to be done by the carrier except to make delivery, the carrier is responsible for such special damages as it was then informed would likely result from its negligence in that regard; under these circumstances the reason for the rule ceases.[88]

Nevertheless, it is the rule in several jurisdictions that the carrier's failure to use diligence to expedite delivery after notice of special damages has been given during transit may subject the carrier to liability for special damages subsequently occurring,[89] although the notice will not relate back to negligence occurring prior thereto,[90] for example, subsequent notice of the effect of further delay after the goods should have been delivered may render the carrier liable for damages accruing after that time by reason of its negligence in not tracing and finding the goods.[91] Also the rule is stated broadly that a carrier is liable for special damages in a case of negligence after its agent acquires knowledge of special circumstances causing such damages.[92]

Subsequent notice of erroneous address. A letter to an express company's agent, notifying him that a package had been wrongly addressed and delivered to the wrong town, and that due to its character it would be worthless if not delivered to the proper addressee within a certain number of days, has been held to be sufficient notice of special circumstances requiring prompt delivery to make the express company liable for special damages, on the theory that a new contract arose from the letter.[93]

c. To Whom Notice Given

The notice should be given to the carrier or to an agent whose duty it is to receive such notice or to act on it.

The notice may, and ordinarily should, be given to the carrier, if a natural person,[94] or to an agent of the carrier in position to act thereon or whose duty it is to receive such notice and cause others to act.[95] The agent who entered into the particular contract or who received the goods for shipment or under whose authority such acts were performed is the obvious and generally the proper medium for such notice.[96] In an action against an express company for delay in shipping goods a notice to the truck driver who issued the bill of lading has been held to be sufficient.[97] The notice need not necessarily be given to the agent having jurisdiction in the matter of delivery.[98] Notice to the carrier's agent as to the point of destination,[99] or notice to a superior traffic officer,[1] may be sufficient under some circumstances.

It has been held that, where mill machinery was shipped to be repaired, and then by a separate contract shipped back, in order to give the carrier notice of special circumstances from which damage would arise from delay in transportation, so as to make it liable therefor, it is not enough that the agent with whom the first contract was made knew thereof, there having been no delay in the first shipment, but the agent with whom the second contract was made must have been informed of such circumstances.[2]

d. Requisites of Notice

The notice should be of matters which naturally and reasonably apprise the carrier of the consequences which would result from a delay in the transportation. Constructive notice may be sufficient.

The carrier will be responsible for the damages sustained if the notice given is of such character and goes to such extent in informing it of the situation that the carrier will be presumed to have contracted with reference thereto.[3] The notice should be of such special matters as naturally and reasonably apprise the person to be charged of the probable consequences of its breach.[4] In other words, the shipper must communicate to the carrier all the facts and circumstances of the case which do not ordinarily attend the carriage of such freight, or the peculiar character and value of the property carried.[5] The notice should ordinarily disclose to the carrier the purpose or use for which the shipment is intended,[6] and the necessity of prompt shipment and delivery.[7]

Repetition of notice. Under an agreement for the carriage of many carloads of construction material, to be used for a special purpose of which the carriers had notice, it was unnecessary to repeat such notice on each shipment, in order to charge the carriers with special damages resulting from delay in transportation.[8]

Constructive notice. The weight of authority supports the rule that, if it appears from the nature of the goods shipped or from other circumstances that the carrier ought to have known of the consequences which would follow from a delay in transportation, it is charged with notice of such circumstances, although no actual notice was given.[9] Under these circumstances the court may justly infer knowledge.[10] In such a case it is not necessary that the special purpose or intended special use of the goods either be mentioned in the negotiations or be expressly made a part of the contract.[11]

Whether the facts in any given case satisfy this rule is often a very close question; in the notes decisions are referred to where the facts were held to show constructive notice,[12] and also where the facts were held not to show constructive notice.[13]

Delivery to an express company for shipment does not of itself necessarily indicate that speed of delivery is the chief consideration, even if this be assumed; however, it does not follow therefrom that it is contemplated that special damages might result from the carrier's failure to exercise speed.[14]

(1) Goods for Household or Purely Personal Use

Special damages are not recoverable for a delay of goods intended for purely personal or household use in the absence of notice.

Where the proximate result of the delay is the loss of the use of goods shipped for purely personal use and the carrier has notice or knowledge of facts that would apprise it that plaintiff would sustain loss in that particular, the measure of damages is the value of the use during the time of delay.[15] Where the carrier is not apprised that any special damages would ensue from delay in transporting a car of household goods, recovery cannot be had for board bills and room rent paid by the owner while awaiting their arrival.[16] The suffering of plaintiffs' families, from cold and inconvenience, by the failure of defendant to deliver them a bill of lading of clothing and household goods shipped, is not the natural and proximate result of a breach of the shipping contract, where defendant was not informed by plaintiffs of their necessitous condition, and the consequent suffering from cold that might ensue from their inability to buy other clothing and goods if those shipped were not promptly delivered.[17] It has been held by an evenly divided court that, where defendant carrier knew of the special circumstances making necessary the presence of plaintiff's trunk at the steamship pier to which it was to be delivered, and that special damages would follow if it was not there on time for the sailing of the ship on which plaintiff had engaged passage, plaintiff might recover not only for such physical suffering, discomfort, and inconvenience as resulted to her directly because of the breach of contract, but also for such mental suffering as resulted from loss of social enjoyment on the trip, by reason of such breach.[18]

(2) Goods for Use in Business

The rules as to the necessity for and the requisites of notice to a carrier in order to recover special damages for delay in transportations have been applied to goods shipped for use in business, such as machinery, feed for stock, fertilizer, and other shipments.

To authorize a recovery for losses of profits in business because of an unreasonable delay of goods to be used in such business, it is essential that the carrier should have had notice either from the nature of the contract itself or by explanation of the circumstances at the time the contract was made that such damages would ensue from nonperformance.[19] It is further essential that the data of estimating such damages should be so definite and certain that they can be ascertained reasonably by calculation, for speculative or uncertain profits are not recoverable.[20] Although the damages claimed may be the ordinary, natural, and even necessary result of the breach, yet, if they are in their nature uncertain, they must be rejected.[21] Other special damages not recoverable in the absence of notice of special circumstances making prompt transportation necessary are losses incurred in paying labor during the stoppage of the business,[22] and interest on the capital invested in a plant during the time it was necessarily idle as a result of the delay.[23]

On the other hand, where the carrier has notice of special circumstances requiring prompt delivery of goods to be used in the shipper's business, and the profits that would have accrued during the time the goods were unreasonably delayed are so definite and certain that they can be ascertained reasonably by calculation, such profits constitute an element of damage for which the shipper may recover;[24] also the expense incurred in paying labor rendered idle because of the unreasonable delay is recoverable, where the carrier knew that this would be the result of the delay.[25]

Losses paid by the consignor to the consignee as liquidated damages previously agreed on for a delay have been held to be recoverable, where made in good faith and not excessive, where the carrier was properly notified as to the intended use of the material shipped.[26]

Delayed building materials

Where defendant carrier was notified that delay in transporting materials would cause plaintiff building contractor's employees to be idle, it is liable for special damages thereafter caused by delay and consequent idleness of employees.—Quanah, A. & P. Ry. Co. v. Bone, Tex.Civ.App., 199 S.W. 332.

26. Kan.—St Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Gaba, 97 P. 435, 78 Kan. 432

Where materials for a building had been delivered to a carrier, and transportation was unreasonably delayed, and the consignor paid the contractor, the consignee, an amount previously agreed on as damages for delay caused by failure to receive the material in due time, the carrier would be held liable for such amount,

Machinery. The rule, laid down in a leading case, that, "if the delay is in the transportation of machinery, to be applied to a special use, and that is known to the carrier, he is responsible for such damages as are fairly attributable to the delay, such as the value of the use of the machinery, to be tested by its rental price, or other proximate means, the expenses of idle hands, the loss of gain on work contracted to be done for another person, if such work could have been done if the machinery had been delivered, and the gain thereby definitely ascertained in proper time,"[27] has been followed in subsequent decisions in which the question has arisen.[28] It is said that notice of special circumstances which would result in special damages to a shipper from delay in transportation of machinery imposes on the carrier the duty to use diligence commensurate with the requirements of the case.[29] In order to recover for profits alleged to have been lost because of unreasonable delay in transportation of machinery, it is essential that they may be computed with reasonable accuracy, since remote and conjectural profits are not recoverable.[30]

Equally well settled as the foregoing doctrine is the principle that unless notice is brought home to the carrier of the special circumstances which render a prompt delivery of the machinery necessary, there can be no recovery of special damages for wrongful delay, such as loss of profits to the business resulting from the delay, expense incurred in paying idle labor, and the interest on the capital invested in a plant during the time it was necessarily idle because of the delay.[31]

Feed for live stock. A carrier is not liable for special damages for failure to deliver cattle feed within a reasonable time after receiving it, where it did not, at the time of such receipt, have notice of the purpose for which the shipment was intended or the urgent necessity of its prompt delivery; to authorize a recovery, the carrier must be notified of the special circumstances from which such damage would probably flow, in case of delay.[32] On the other hand, where the carrier unreasonably delayed a shipment of cattle feed and had notice that it was intended to feed plaintiff's cattle and that plaintiff was dependent thereon for the feed, and plaintiff's supply of feed was exhausted by reason of the delay, the carrier is liable for the depreciation in the value of the cattle caused directly and proximately by the delay.[33]

Fertilizer. It has been held that, where, on shipment of fertilizer, there was no notice to the carrier of any special use to which it was to be applied nor of such scarcity of fertilizer as to prevent another purchase of a like amount by plaintiff, plaintiff is not entitled to special damages for failure to deliver the fertilizer.[34] On the other hand, in a suit for injury to plaintiff's crop by reason of the carrier's delay in transporting a shipment of nitrate of soda for fertilizer, it has been considered to be hardly possible that defendant carrier did not know the purpose of the shipment, and it has been held liable for such damages.[35]

Other shipments. Other applications of these rules as to the necessity and sufficiency of notice, actual or constructive, for the recovery of special damages for delay, have been made to shipments of actor's paraphernalia,[36] automobiles,[37] building

(3) Goods for Sale at Particular Market

If the carrier has notice that goods are being transported to a particular market and transportation is unreasonably delayed, it is liable for special damages ensuing.

If it is within the knowledge of the carrier at the time the contract of shipment is entered into that the goods are to be transported for sale at a particular market and the transportation is unreasonably delayed, whereby the shipper loses the benefit of such market, the carrier will be liable for any special damages resulting from such delay.[56] It has been held that, under these circumstances, the shipper may recover the difference between the price at which he was obliged to sell the property when it did arrive and that which he would have received at the time at which it should have arrived;[57] but it would seem that no notice of special circumstances would have been necessary in these cases in order to recover such damages, as these cases are clearly within the general rule stated supra §§ 222 c, 223.

Special damages resulting from a delay in transporting live stock to a market in time for a special sales day may be recovered, even though the stock had not been sold under a definite contract before shipment was made, such damages not being speculative or conjectural on that account.[58]

(4) Goods under Contract of Sale

Special damages for the loss of a sale occasioned by delay are not recoverable unless the carrier was notified of such contract.

A carrier who unreasonably delays the transportation of goods shipped under a contract of sale is not liable for any special damages occasioned by the loss of the sale, as for instance, any profits the shipper would have made by delivery of the goods at destination according to the contract of sale, unless at or before the day of the shipment the carrier was notified of the existence of the contract and that the goods were being shipped in accordance therewith,[59] under such circumstances the rule stated supra § 223 a governs, that is, the measure of damages is the difference between the market value of the goods at the time they ought to have been delivered and their value at the time they were actually delivered,[60] with such other and incidental damages as proximately flow from the delay,[61] with added interest and the unpaid cost of transportation deducted.[62]

Where, however, goods are contracted to be sold at a fixed price and to be delivered at a particular place, and the carrier undertakes the transportation thereof, with full notice that the goods are to be sold if forwarded seasonably, the consignor will be entitled to recover the difference between the contract price and the value of the goods when actually delivered, if by reason of unreasonable delay in transportation he loses the sale;[63] under these circumstances, the undertaking is special and the loss and liability are special.[64]

Sale in foreign country. Where a carrier, agreeing to ship grain for export to a foreign country with notice that it has been sold there for future delivery, unreasonably delays delivery to the ship, the shipper can recover the difference between the price at which the shipper sold the grain and the market price in the foreign country at the time the shipper breached its contract, as it was compelled to do by the delay.[65]

Shipper unable to dispose of goods. In an action for damages for loss of a sale of a consignment of goods, evidence that the shipper had been unable to dispose of the goods after several attempts does not authorize a recovery of the full amount of the sale price as special damage, this not being evidence that they had no market value.[66]

§ 230. Delay in Transportation of Corpse

The cases are not in harmony as to the liability of a carrier for damages for mental anguish for delay in the delivery of a corpse.

In a number of states it is held that damages are recoverable for mental suffering caused by negligent delay of a carrier in transporting a corpse of a near relative, such as a husband, son, wife, or father.[67] A recovery, however, is permitted only for the mental suffering felt by plaintiff on account of the wrongful delay;[68] he is not entitled to recover for mental suffering of other near relatives of deceased caused by such delay;[69] and, where the contract for transportation of the corpse is made by a stranger, and the existence of the parents of deceased is not disclosed to the carrier, the mental anguish of the mother, resulting from wrongful delay in transportation, is not recoverable.[70] Damages are not allowable for mental anguish claimed to have been suffered on account of the postponement of a funeral, where, notwithstanding the delay, the corpse arrived an hour before the time appointed for the funeral and was prepared for burial at the time, and where plaintiff of her own accord postponed the funeral until the following day.[71] So it has been held that a mother is not entitled to recover for mental anguish for delay in delivering a coffin, necessitating burial of a child in a different burying ground than that intended, where her condition was such that she did not know of the delay, the intention to bury in the other burying ground, or where the body was buried.[72] Damages are not allowable for reembalming the body, where this is necessitated by the voluntary act of plaintiff in postponing the funeral.[73]

It is the rule in some jurisdictions that there can be no recovery of damages because of mental pain and anguish alone from the carrier's negligent delay in transporting a corpse, where there was no physical tort resulting in injury to plaintiff's person or any pecuniary loss.[74] In still other jurisdictions, in the absence of willful and malicious misconduct on the part of the carrier or its agents, damages for mental anguish for a delay in the shipment of a corpse are not recoverable.[75]

Damages for injury to corpse generally see infra § 273.

Evidence that plaintiff's son made arrangements with the carrier's ticket agent to ship corpse over a certain route, paid for its transportation, and bought tickets for four persons to accompany it, shows facts sufficient to put the agent on inquiry as to the identity of the persons who were to use the tickets and as to their relationship to deceased, so that the carrier was charged with notice that the corpse was that of plaintiff's deceased wife, and of the fact that one of the tickets was for use by him, and should be held to have contemplated that he would undergo mental suffering if the contract was breached.—Lancaster v. Q. CLAIMS FOR DAMAGES, WAIVER, NOTICE OF CLAIM, AND CONTRACTUAL LIMITATION OF TIME TO SUE

§ 231. Claims in General

Statutes which impose certain burdens on carriers because of their failure to settle, pay, or reject claims for loss and damages within a specified time have been upheld.

The validity of various state statutes which impose certain burdens on carriers in case they do not proceed within a certain time to settle, pay, or reject claims for loss or damage has been upheld against objections that such statutes were violative of the federal constitution,[76] including the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment,[77] and of the state constitution.[78] In some jurisdictions, statutes have been enacted which impose penalties on carriers for failure, within a designated time, to adjust claims for loss of, or injury to, goods, and these statutes are considered below in §§ 474–480.

§ 232. Waiver of Claim

While acceptance of the goods by the consignee, without objection and with knowledge of their defective condition, may prevent recovery for the loss, acceptance does not under all circumstances defeat a right to recover.

Acceptance of the goods by the consignee, without objection and with knowledge of their defective condition, may preclude recovery for damages thereto,[79] or for loss or destruction subsequent to delivery due to such defective condition.[80] The consignee is entitled, however, to a reasonable opportunity for examination, and acceptance for that purpose will not be a waiver;[81] nor will acceptance waive objection for damage not apparent.[82] Indeed, the receipt of the goods alone, with no stipulation that they are accepted in full performance of the contract, does not, it seems, constitute a waiver of claim for damages for which the carrier may be liable.[83] A receipt acknowledging a delivery of the goods in good condition is only prima facie evidence of the fact.[84]

Where, if the carrier had performed its duty of unloading an animal instead of permitting the consignee to unload, the carrier could, or should, have discovered an apparent injury, it cannot complain of a lost opportunity to discover the injury, as bearing on the right of the consignee to claim damages for the injury, notwithstanding he had discovered the injury before accepting the animal.[85]

The retaking of a claim filed by the shipper, after it has been considered and rejected by the carrier's agent, does not amount to a withdrawal of the claim, unless so intended.[86]

Where the initial carrier delivered the wrong kind of a car for the shipment contemplated by the consignor, his direction, after delivery to the connecting carrier, to transport the goods to destination does not absolve the initial carrier from liability for injuries to the goods caused by such improper car, where the consignor did not discover the damage until the car reached destination.[87]

Acceptance of a portion of the goods will not waive objection on account of the damaged condition of the balance.[88] If, however, the consignee desires to recover damages for breach of the entire contract, in excess of the value of the goods not delivered, he should, after discovering the inability of the carrier to deliver the balance, tender the return of the portion accepted.[89]

Payment of the freight charges is not a waiver of the right to recover damages, as the consignee may maintain action therefor without interposing it by way of offset or counterclaim as against the freight.[90]

Release executed without authority. A release of damages by the consignor is not binding on the consignee if executed without his authority.[91]

§ 233. Notice of Claim for Damages

Stipulations in shipping contracts requiring notice to the carrier of a claim for loss or damage are usual but do not restrict the time within which action may be brought and do not exempt the carrier from liability for negligence.

Stipulations in bills of lading or other contracts of shipment that written notice of a claim for loss of, or damage to, the goods shipped shall be given to the carrier or his agent within a designated time, and that unless such notice is given there will be no liability on the part of the carrier, are very generally upheld in so far as they are found to be reasonable, as shown infra § 237, unless there are constitutional or statutory provisions directly or by implication forbidding them, as shown infra § 236. According to some cases, they are conditions in the nature of estoppels.[92] They operate to prevent the enforcement of the obligations of the contract when not complied with as shown below in § 234, and are not the equivalent of statutes of limitation restricting the time within which actions may be brought,[93] nor are they in any sense an exemption from liability for negligence directly or indirectly.[94] There is a difference of opinion as to whether these contracts are limitations of the carrier's common-law liability. A number of decisions maintain that they are not, unless the time required for giving notice is unnecessarily short,[95] and a similar view has prevailed in some jurisdictions in respect of a stipulation for the making of a written claim within a specified time.[96] Other decisions take the contrary view and hold that these stipulations are in effect a limitation of the carrier's common-law liability.[97] The operation and effect of this diversity of views is shown in subsequent sections.

While, according to some cases, stipulations of the general type here under consideration do not apply where the shipment is made under parol contract and not under the bill of lading,[98] a stipulation for claim in writing within a specified time in a uniform bill of lading prescribed by the interstate commerce commission has been given effect in the case of an interstate shipment, notwithstanding no bill of lading was issued in the particular case.[99]

§ 234. Necessity for Notice

a. Want of requirement in contract
b. Stipulation requiring notice

a. Want of Requirement in Contract

Notice to the carrier of loss of, or injury to, goods shipped is not a condition precedent to an action for such loss or injury in the absence of any provision in the shipping contract requiring notice.

In the absence of some special provision in the contract of shipment requiring it, it is not a condition precedent to a suit for loss of, or injury to, the goods shipped that notice thereof shall be given to the carrier, or that claim shall be made,[1] and, where there is no binding stipulation in that regard, the shipper may sue on his claim at any time

Even though the delivery of live stock to a carrier for shipment is the beginning of transportation, either at common law or under the statute, there is no duty imposed by law on the shipper to give notice of any claim for damages arising thereafter, and such notice can be imposed only by contract.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Shipley, 245 S.W. 524, 147 Tenn. 40.

b. Stipulation Requiring Notice

In general, a claimant is not entitled to recover from the carrier in the absence of due compliance with stipulations in the shipping contract as to giving notice or making claim.

Stipulations in bills of lading or other contracts of shipment which require written notice of a claim for loss of, or damage to, the goods shipped in order to impose liability on the carrier are, according to some cases, conditions in the nature of estoppels, as shown in § 233; if the stipulation is valid and effective, under the rules set forth in §§ 236, 237, it operates to prevent the enforcement of the contract when not complied with,[3] that is, notice is a condition precedent and the carrier is not liable if notice is not given in accordance with the stipulation.[4] A like rule applies to a requirement of the contract of shipment for the presentation or filing of a written claim for loss or damage within a stated time.[5]

Prior oral contract

§ 235. · Purpose and Validity of Provisions for Notice

The purpose of requiring notice of, or the making or presenting of, claim for loss, damage, or injury is to give the carrier opportunity to investigate or inquire while the facts bearing on the justice of the claim are readily available.

As shown in §§ 236, 237, stipulations requiring notice of claim or the making of a claim in writing are usually upheld where they are reasonable and do not contravene any constitutional or statutory provision. The purpose of requiring such notice or claim is to enable the carrier, while the occurrence is recent, to inform itself of the actual facts occasioning the loss or injury, that it may protect itself against claims which might be made on it after such lapse of time as to make it difficult, if not impossible, to ascertain the truth;[6] or, as otherwise expressed, the purpose of a notice of claim or of the presentation of a written claim is to afford the carrier an opportunity to investigate,[7] or to facilitate prompt investigation.[8]

Right of shipper not restored by order of interstate commerce commission

Shipper who failed to comply with stipulation requiring making claim in writing within a specified time after delivery could not claim the benefit of the order of the interstate commerce commission allowing the filing of all loss and damage claims that accrued within two years prior to February 9, 1914, where the interstate shipment in question had actually been delivered to the consignee more than two years prior to such date.

Mich.—Otto v. Manistee & N. E. R. Co., 163 N.W. 49, 196 Mich. 746.

Loss of shipment

In an action for the value of goods shipped to a foreign country, shipper's contention that proof of delivery and acceptance of goods by carrier and its failure to make delivery at destination established a prima facie case, and imposed the burden on carried to prove that the loss resulted from a cause for which it was not responsible, is no answer to carrier's defense that shipper failed to present claim within four months as required by the shipping contract, as a condition precedent to recovery.—Apostolou v. American Ry. Express Co., 122 A. 326, 81 N.H. 115.

Mexican carrier

Where bill of lading issued by Mexican carrier provided that shipment was subject to conditions of bills of lading of participating carriers, Mexican carrier was not liable for alleged conversion of goods, which it had transported, where no written claim had been filed with it or its connecting carrier within time required by provision in bill of lading issued by connecting carrier.—Wells Fargo & Co., Express, S. A., v. Tribolet, 50 P.2d 878, 46 Ariz. 311.

Notice timely

Where the agent of the delivering carrier was present at the unloading of the stock and saw their condition, a written notice containing an itemized statement of plaintiff's claim given to such agent some days thereafter was sufficient, even though a stipulation in the contract of shipment provided that a notice of claim for damages should be given in writing before removal of the stock and before it was mingled with other stock.—Chicago, I. & L. (1) "The manifest object of such a provision is to force those claiming to be damaged by the carrier's negligence, to promptly present their claims for adjustment while the facts and circumstances upon which they are based are fresh in the memories of the parties and witnesses, and to prevent being harassed or imposed upon by dishonest claimants."—Black v. (4) "A notice of claim is solely to put the railway company on inquiry as to the facts upon which the claim is based, so that it may be informed as to the situation and conditions, at a time when the evidence may be more easily investigated, and possibly before recollection of the facts may have disappeared from the minds of those familiar therewith, and in order that there may be no unreasonable delay in bringing actions."—Parham v. a. State Constitutional and Statutory Provisions

State constitutional and statutory provisions regulating notice of, and claims for, loss or injury are given effect in so far as they apply to intra-state shipments and are otherwise valid.

A state has the right to enact statutes applicable to intra-state shipments, which are designed to safeguard the rights of shippers as to provisions for notice,[9] and a provision of a state constitution that a stipulation in a contract or agreement for notice or demand other than provided by law as a condition precedent to liability shall be null and void applies to contracts for intra-state shipments and renders void and ineffective provisions in such a contract which contravene such constitutional provision.[10]

In a number of jurisdictions where constitutional or statutory provisions prohibit carriers from limiting their common-law liability, it is held that provisions of the character under consideration are limitations of liability and void,[11] and it is immaterial that there was a consideration consisting in a reduced rate of transportation.[12] In other jurisdictions the opposite conclusion has been reached.[13]

Limitations of this character are not prohibited by a statute which prohibits a common carrier from limiting by contract, rule, or regulation its liability for damages resulting from its own negligence or the negligence of any other common carrier in whose possession the property may be for transportation by virtue of the bill of lading which a statute requires the initial carrier to issue to the shipper,[14] nor by a statute which provides that every condition of a contract restricting another from enforcing his rights thereunder, or limiting the time for so doing, is void.[15] The view has been taken, however, that a statutory provision that

In Texas

(1) The rule stated in the text has been applied or recognized.—St. Louis, B. & M. Ry. Co. v. Marcofich, Com.App., 221 S.W. 582, affirming, Civ.App., 185 S.W. 51—Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Allen, 87 S.W. 168, 39 Tex. Civ.App. 236.

(2) Rev.St.1911 art. 708, first enacted in 1863, prohibiting carriers from limiting or restricting their common-law liability, was not repealed by implication by art. 5714, which, without special reference to carriers, prohibits stipulations requiring notice of any claim for damages within a less period than ninety days.—St. Louis, B. & M. Ry. Co. v. Marcofich, supra.

(3) A stipulation of a contract for the shipment of live stock that, as a condition precedent to the shipper's right to recover for loss or injury, he will give notice in writing of his claim before the live stock is removed from the place of destination or from the place of delivery and before it is mingled with other stock, violated the statute prohibiting carriers from limiting their common-law liability.—Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Trawick, 4 S.W. 567, 68 Tex. 314, 2 Am.S.R. 494.

(4) So, a stipulation for notice before removal of the live stock from the cars was invalid.—Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Allen, supra.

(5) Some of the earlier cases apparently upheld stipulations for notice before removal of stock.—Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Hamm, 2 Tex.A.Civ.Cas. § 491—Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Harman, 2 Tex.A.Civ.Cas. § 136.

(6) The statutory provision against limiting common-law liability rendered invalid a stipulation that, as a condition precedent to the recovery of damages for injury to live stock in transit, notice of damage should be given within ninety-one days after such damage occurred, notwithstanding another and subsequently enacted statute provided that a stipulation in any contract requiring notice of claim for damages as a condition precedent shall be void if the time fixed for giving notice shall be less than ninety days.—St. Louis, B. & M. Ry. Co. v. Marcofich, supra.

(7) Prior to the decision in St. Louis, B. & M. Ry. Co. v. Marofich supra, the ninety-day statute was considered in declaring invalid stipulations which allowed less than ninety days.—Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Langbehn, Civ.App., 150 S.W. 1188, rehearing denied 158 S.W. 244.—10 C.J. p. 331 note 44 [a], p. 332 note 66 [c] (3).

(8) Furthermore, stipulations which allowed more than ninety days were upheld in some cases.—Turner v. Henderson, Civ.App., 183 S.W. 51.—10 C.J. p. 332 note 66 [c] (4), (5).

(9) Even since the decision in St. Louis, B. & M. Ry. Co. v. Marcofich, supra, the ninety-day statute has been considered in asserting that a stipulation for notice of claim within one hundred and twenty days was reasonable and could be enforced.—St. Louis Southwestern Ry. Co. of Texas v. Seale & Jones, Civ.App., 247 S.W. 883, modified on other grounds, Com.App., 267 S.W. 676.

14. Kan.—Ray v. Missouri, etc., R. Co., 133 P. 847, 90 Kan. 244.

In North Dakota it has been held that a clause in a special contract with a common carrier, providing that, when property is injured the shipper must, as a condition precedent to recovery therefor, give notice in writing before the property is removed from the place of destination, is not prohibited by Rev.Code 1905 § 5678, providing that a common carrier cannot be exonerated by any agreement in anticipation thereof from liability for the gross negligence, fraud, or willful wrong of itself or its employees.—Cooke v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 133 N.W. 303, 22 N.D. 266.

limitations prescribed by statute shall not be changed by contract and that any attempted change by contract shall be void rendered ineffective a provision of a contract of shipment requiring the presentation of a written claim to the carrier within a specified time.[16]

A statute which makes void all stipulations forfeiting any right of action for failure to present a claim for damages unless the event pertaining to the loss or injury is peculiarly within the knowledge of one party renders ineffective a provision, in a contract to which the statute applies, requiring notice of claim where claimant does not come within the provision as to knowledge.[17] Such statute does not require the contract itself, in providing for notice, to contain the statement that the event is peculiarly within the knowledge of the party required to give notice.[18]

Under some statutes the stipulation is not binding unless the signature of the shipper to the contract in which it was incorporated was obtained.[19]

b. Federal Legislation

The Carmack amendment did not invalidate stipulations for notice or claim in contracts of shipment. There must, however, be due compliance with subsequent federal statutes applicable to such stipulations.

The Carmack amendment, Act of June 29, 1906, 34 U.S.St. at L. p 593 c 3591 § 7, 49 U.S.C.A. § 20 par (11), although it prohibits a common carrier from limiting its liability for damages resulting from its own negligence or that of any other common carrier into whose possession the property may come for transportation by virtue of the bill of lading which the section requires the initial carrier to issue to the shipper, as shown above in § 99 and below in § 407, does not limit the right of the carrier to make a reasonable contract with the shipper requiring notice of loss or damage or making or filing of claim in writing.[20] Prior to the enactment of the Carmack amendment the supreme court of the United States had declared such notices valid;[21] and inasmuch as the Carmack amendment supersedes all state decisions, statutes, and policies on the subject of interstate commerce shipments,[22] state constitutional and statutory provisions which prohibit contracts requiring notice of loss or injury are rendered void and inoperative so far as interstate shipments are concerned.[23]

Statutes fixing minimum periods. The first Cummins amendment, Act of March 4, 1915, 38 U.S.St. at L. p 1196 c 176, as amended by Act of March 4, 1927, 44 U.S.St. at L. p 1448 c 510 § 3, 49 U.S. C.A. § 20 par (11), which did not apply to a case which arose prior to its enactment,[24] forbidding carriers to provide a shorter period for giving notice of claims than ninety days and for the filing of claims than four months has again been amended by Act of April 23, 1930, 46 U.S.St. at L. p 251 c 208, 49 U.S.C.A. § 20 par (11), which omits any restriction as to giving notice of claim and fixes the minimum time which may be provided within which to file claim at nine months.[25] While the governing statute renders ineffective a provision in a shipping

Neither consignors-consignees of intra-state shipment, nor indorsees of bill of lading, were under the evidence, parties possessing, peculiarly, knowledge affecting conversion by misdelivery, which they should, under provision of Code 1907 § 4297, have communicated to carrier.—Southern Ry. Prior oral contract

In a case which was governed by the law in force prior to the first Cummins amendment, the view was expressed that the written contract for an interstate shipment, contemplated by Carmack amendment, being free from fraud, prevails over a precedent oral contract, so that provision of the written contract for notice of claim of damages, if reasonable, controls.—Panhandle & S. 25. Notice of claim

(1) The ninety-day provision of the statute, prior to the amendment of 1930, rendered ineffective a provision in a shipping contract subject to the statute which required the giving of notice of claim within a period less than that fixed in the statute.
Ariz.—Southern Pac. R. Co. of Mexico v Gonzalez, 61 P.2d 377, 48 Ariz. 260.

contract subject thereto which requires the filing of a claim within a period less than that fixed in the applicable statute,[26] it is permissible for the carrier to fix a period for filing claim which is not less,[27] or which is greater,[28] than the minimum so fixed, and a stipulation that claim for loss, in case of failure to deliver, must be made within a specified time, not less than the minimum fixed by the statute, after the lapse of a reasonable time for delivery, is permissible and valid under the statute and is controlling.[29]

Requirement of notice or claim forbidden. Another provision of the first Cummins amendment, as amended, which provided that, in the cases included, no notice of claim nor filing of claim shall be required as a condition precedent to recovery has been omitted from the statute as again amended by Act of April 23, 1930, 46 U.S.St. at L. p 251 c 208, 49 U.S.C.A. § 20 par (11).[30] The provision of the first Cummins amendment that no notice of claim nor filing of claim shall be required embraced three classes of claims: loss, damage, or injury due to delay; damage while the shipment was being loaded or unloaded; and damage in transit,[31] and carelessness or negligence of the

(2) The view was taken that such provision prevented the carrier from making a binding stipulation that the shipper of live stock should give notice of his claim before removal of stock from place of destination or of delivery and before mingling with other animals.—Ingram v. Davis, supra.

(3) The ninety-day provision of the statute applied to a provision in the shipping contract as to notice regarding loss or injury, because the claim must necessarily be founded on the loss or injury, and the word "claim," as used in the statute, was broad enough to cover loss or injury. —Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Martindale, supra.

(4) The view was taken that such provision prevented the carrier from contracting with the shipper for written notice of loss or injury to cattle before they were removed from unloading pens.—Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Martindale, supra.

(5) Provision of contract of shipment of live stock for written notice to carrier, before removal of the stock from carrier's possession, of any visible or manifest injury, was invalid, in case of interstate shipment, under the ninety-day provision.—Wichita Valley Ry. Co. v. Baldwin, Tex.Civ.App., 270 S.W. 1089.

(6) The supreme court of the United States, in referring to the provision in the uniform live stock contract for information in writing of injury before removal from possession of carrier or mingling with other live stock, said that the provision did not purport to make compliance a condition precedent and that it was unnecessary to decide whether in any case it could be so read.—Missouri Pac. (7) Goods delivered to the person designated by the consignee, who was not the holder of the order bill of lading, and unloaded by the person to whom they were delivered, not by the carrier, were not lost to the holder of the bill of lading while being unloaded, within the meaning of the statute under consideration. —Davis v. First Nat. Bank of Longview, Tex.Civ.App., 245 S.W. 1009.

Classification made in earlier case

In one of the early cases in which the classification of claims under the first Cummins amendment was considered, the view was expressed that two classes were contemplated by the amendment: those for loss due to delay or damage while being loaded or unloaded, or damaged in transit, which might be called "transit claims"; and those for loss otherwise sustained, called "nontransit claims"; and that, as to the "transit claims," the carrier could not require the filing of claim as a condition precedent to recovery, but that as to nontransit claims the rule was otherwise —Bell v. New York Cent. R. Co, 175 N.Y S 712, 187 App Div. 564.

But, in a case decided before the question was definitely settled by the supreme court of the United States, the necessity for the existence of negligence was not emphasized — Talbott v. Payne, 111 S E 328, 90 W. Va. 280.

Construction of amendment

In construing the provision in question which actually read: "Provided, however, that if the loss, damage, or injury complained of was due to delay or damage while being loaded or unloaded, or damaged in transit by carelessness or negligence, then no notice of claim nor filing of claim shall be required as a condition precedent to recovery," it was held that the provision should be read as though the comma were omitted after "unloaded," and as though the word "damaged" were "damage."—Chesapeake & O. Failure safely to transport live stock

The statutory provision did not apply where shipper predicated liability of the carrier solely on failure safely to transport live stock, without relying on carelessness or negligence as a basis of liability.—Cunningham v. Missouri Pac. R Co., Mo. App., 219 S W. 1003.

Actual carelessness or negligence

Delay in delivery

(1) The carrier could properly require a written notice of claim based on delay in delivery within a specified time, where there was no carelessness or negligence on the part of the carrier —Barrett v. Van Pelt, 45 S.Ct. 437, 268 U S 85, 69 L Ed. 857, reversing Van Pelt v. Barrett, 199 N.Y.S. 509, 205 App Div. 332

(2) In a case decided before the decision in Barrett v Van Pelt, supra, it was held that the statutory provision forbidding the carrier to

U.S.St. at L. p 1449 c 510 § 3, which changed the language of the foregoing provision to read that, if the loss, damage, or injury complained of was due to carelessness or negligence while the property was in transit, or while the property was being loaded or unloaded, or was due to unreasonable delay in transit or in loading or unloading, no notice of claim or filing of claim shall be required as a condition precedent to recovery controlled and rendered unnecessary a notice of claim or filing of claim in cases to which such subsequent amendment applied.[33]

Notice of injury. The direction in each of the foregoing amendments that no "notice of claim" shall be required included a written notice of injury.[34]

Notice to connecting carriers. Since, under the Carmack amendment, as hereinafter discussed in § 406, whenever an initial carrier accepts goods for shipment to a point on another line in another state, it is conclusively treated as having made a through contract of shipment and will be liable for any loss or injury occurring on any connecting line over which the shipment may pass, as well as for loss or injury occurring on its own line, to require the shipper of an interstate shipment, in order to recover for a loss, to file his verified claim with the connecting carrier which caused the injury would defeat the purpose of the amendment, which was to relieve shippers of the difficult and almost impossible task of determining on which of several connecting lines the damage occurred.[35]

§ 237. Requisites and Validity of Stipulations for Notice

a. In general
b. Consideration
c. Reasonableness in general
d. Time

a. In General

In the absence of contravening constitutional or statutory provisions, stipulations in shipping contracts for written notice of claim or for written claim are in general valid and effective where they are reasonable.

In the absence of contravening constitutional or statutory provisions, considered above in § 236, stipulations in bills of lading or other contracts of shipment which require written notice of a claim for loss of, or damage to, goods shipped[36] or the making or filing of a written claim[37] are valid and are very generally upheld, in so far as they are found to be reasonable, being usually regarded as a fair, just, and reasonable protection to the carrier,[38] and, working no hardship on the shipper, compliance with their requirements benefits both the carrier and the shipper.[39] These stipulations are not against public policy.[40]

Contractual requirements for written notice of claim for loss or damage to goods shipped are viewed with some strictness by the law, and unless the exemption from liability is clearly expressed it should not be allowed.[41] So, it has been held that a stipulation for notice in a bill of lading or other contract is of no force unless it is personally assented to by the shipper.[42]

Where provisions of the character under consideration are considered limitations of the common-law liability, it has been held that the general rule requiring that the shipper shall be given his option whether or not to ship under the limited liability contract applies; and, if not given this option, the requirement as to notice is void.[43]

The view has been expressed that the validity of notices of this character as applied to interstate shipments is not affected by the fact that the carrier has not filed a schedule of rates.[44]

b. Consideration

Consideration for a stipulation for notice or claim is necessary where and only where such stipulation is re-

However, it has been held that a provision of an interstate shipment contract that neither the initial carrier nor any connecting carrier should be liable for any damage to the animals shipped, unless claim be made within ten days from the time the animals were removed, to the carrier on whose line the damage occurred, was valid.—Jordan v. In respect of a requirement of a claim in writing, the view has been expressed that the ground on which such requirement is regarded as reasonable is that the notice to the carrier permits it to preserve evidence of the transaction so that it may defend itself.—Kershaw Oil Mill v. garded as a limitation of the carrier's common-law liability.

In view of the general rule, set forth above in § 95, that a contract limiting a carrier's common-law liability must be supported by an independent consideration, whether or not a new consideration is necessary to support a contract providing for notice of loss or injury or for making claims in writing, depends on whether or not a contract of this character is considered as one which limits the carrier's common-law liability. In jurisdictions where the view is taken that the contract does not amount to a limitation of the carrier's common-law liability no independent consideration is necessary;[45] but in jurisdictions where it is considered that the stipulation does operate as a limitation of liability, an independent consideration is regarded as necessary.[46] In any event, a reduction in the rates of freight is a sufficient consideration for a stipulation requiring notice of loss or injury or making of claim in writing.[47]

Interstate shipments. As shown above in § 236, the Carmack amendment and subsequent federal statutes do not render void and ineffective all stipulations for notice of claim or of injury or for making claim in writing, and a contract for an interstate shipment containing a clause of the character under consideration may be valid even though not supported by an independent consideration.[48] On the contrary, such a contract, even though made in a state where the provision is considered a limitation of the carrier's common-law liability and void unless supported by an independent consideration, is none the less valid, although not supported by such consideration,[49] in view of the operation and effect of the federal statutes governing interstate commerce, considered in general aspects above in § 17. In some cases involving interstate shipments, the added fact that there was a reduction in rate as a consideration has been considered in recognizing the binding effect of the stipulation.[50]

c. Reasonableness in General

Stipulations requiring notice must be reasonable.

Stipulations requiring notice of loss or injury must be reasonable; otherwise they will not be enforced.[51] While the view has been taken that, in determining the general validity of such a stipulation, the question is not what might have been done in a particular case, but what might ordinarily be expected in the exercise of reasonable diligence,[52] it has been held or recognized that stipulations must be reasonably and justly construed in their application to the facts of each case,[53] so as not to exempt the carrier from the performance of any part of its contractual or legal duties with the shipper.[54] While the carrier may invoke the stipulation as a shield to guard itself against possible imposition, the stipulation cannot be used as a sword with which to defeat its adversary, without regard to the merits or justice of the course.[55] The question as to whether a stipulation is reasonable depends to a great extent on whether or not sufficient time is allowed to discover the loss and to give notice, as shown in the following subdivision of this section, and on all the other circumstances of the case.[56]

If there is indefiniteness and uncertainty as to the agent to whom notice is to be given, or an agent is named to whom it would be impracticable to give notice, or if there is no agent reasonably accessible, the stipulation is unreasonable.[57] Such, also, is the case in respect of stipulations so broad as to cover any loss whatever,[58] or which are uncertain as to the time from which the specified limitation is to run, as shown in the following subdivision of this section.

A contract exempting the carrier from liability except for willful or gross negligence, and then only on presentation of a claim, is void.[59]

A stipulation which limits the claimant's right to recover to the damages set forth in the written notice and claim and fixes the limit of recovery at the amount therein claimed has been regarded as reasonable.[60]

d. Time

(1) In general
(2) Live stock shipments

(1) In General

Whether or not the time allowed in a stipulation for giving notice or making claim is reasonable depends largely on the facts of the particular case.

Whether or not the time allowed in a requirement for notice is reasonable depends largely on the character of the shipment, the situation of the parties, and the circumstances of each particular case,[61] or, as sometimes stated, on whether or not sufficient time is given to permit claimant, with reasonable diligence, to discover the damage and give notice;[62] and it seems that the determination as to reasonableness may depend on opportunities to know of the loss.[63]

In the absence of constitutional or statutory regulations, considered above in § 236, there is some diversity in the conclusions of the courts as to what is a reasonable time within which notice or claim may be required to be given or made. If the time specified is to date from the delivery of the goods to the carrier or from the date of the contract of shipment, it may be unreasonable, at least where the time allowed might be largely consumed in the performance of the contract before it could be determined whether or not there was any breach.[64] So, a requirement that notice be given or claim be made within thirty days[65] or within thirty-two days[66] after the date of issuance of the receipt has been regarded as void. On the other hand, a stipulation providing for notice within ninety days after issuance of a receipt or bill of lading by the carrier has been held reasonable,[67] as has a limitation of sixty days from the date of the receipt for the goods issued by the carrier,[68] and even of thirty days from such date.[69]

A stipulation that claims for loss or damage shall be presented within four months after delivery, or after a reasonable time for delivery, is reasonable and valid,[70] as is a similar stipulation fixing a limitation period of six months.[71] A provision that claim for damages for loss or injury shall be made within thirty days from the time the goods were delivered, or after a reasonable time for delivery, has also been regarded as reasonable;[72] but there are decisions which maintain the contrary view.[73] It has been held or recognized that a requirement of notice or of making claim in writing within ten days,[74] five days,[75] thirty-six hours,[76] thirty-four hours,[77] and even thirty hours,[78] from the time of the delivery of the goods by the carrier may, under the circumstances, be held reasonable, and, in respect of perishable goods, a stipulation requiring the consignee to report a claim for damages to the delivering line within thirty-six hours after the consignee has been notified of the arrival of the goods at the place of destination has been regarded as reasonable.[79] The fact that in the case of a through interstate shipment, the stipulation requires that notice of claim shall be given within one day after delivery of the property at destination to the agent for the initial carrier does not render the stipulation unreasonable, in view of the rule that the delivering carrier is the agent of the initial carrier.[80]

It is apparent, in cases of these short-limitation stipulations, that their validity must depend largely on the facts of the particular case,[81] and where it appears that, under the circumstances, the time was unreasonably short they cannot be upheld.[82] Ordinarily, the question of reasonableness is for the jury;[83] but where the evidence shows conclusively that notice of injury could not have been given within the time limited, it is error to submit to the jury the question whether the time allowed for giving the notice was reasonable.[84]

A stipulation may be unreasonable because there is uncertainty as to the time from which the specified limitation is to run.[85]

(2) Live Stock Shipments

In the absence of contravening constitutional or statutory provisions, stipulations allowing comparatively short periods for giving notice or making claims in respect of loss of, or injury to, live stock have been upheld.

The controlling considerations bearing on the reasonableness of a stipulation as to the time within which notice of a claim for damages shall be given in case of shipments of live stock are somewhat different from those applicable to inanimate freight, and provisions for notice of loss or injury more stringent than those ordinarily upheld in the case of inanimate freight have been sustained. Thus, while there are a few decisions to the contrary,[86] in the absence of statutory or constitutional provisions affecting the question, considered in § 236 supra, the weight of authority upholds stipulations that a notice of claim or claim for damages shall be made before the animals are removed from the place of destination or of delivery and mingled with other animals, as a condition precedent to the right to recover therefor,[87] and the courts have

Interstate shipments prior to statutory regulation as to time

(1) In respect of interstate shipments which apparently were made before congress had enacted any statute regulating the time for giving of notice or making claims, the validity and binding effect of a stipulation requiring the making of claim in writing within five days from the time stock was removed from car was recognized or upheld.

(3) The same view was taken as to a requirement of a claim in writing within ten days from time of removal from car or from unloading.

U S.—Southern Pac. Co. v. Stewart, Ariz., 39 S Ct 139, 248 U S 446, 63 L.Ed. 350, reversing 233 F. 956, 147 C C A. 630, in which error is dismissed 38 S.Ct. 130, 245 U S. 359, 62 L Ed. 345, rehearing granted 38 S

the circumstances notice could not have been given within the time allowed,[93] as where the nature and extent of the damages could not have been ascertained within the time limited,[94] and where there was no agent of the carrier at the point of destination to whom the notice could have been given.[95] A stipulation requiring notice of injuries to be given to the carrier at a town en route where the stock was not unloaded is unreasonable, the shipper having had no opportunity to determine the extent of the injuries until the cattle were unloaded at destination,[96] and a like rule has been recognized in respect of a requirement that notice be given to the initial carrier at a junction point before transfer to a connecting carrier.[97]

As shown in § 240 infra, in a number of decisions it has been held that, if the time for giving notice is unreasonably short, this will not relieve the shipper from giving any notice at all of his claims, but he will still be required to give notice within a reasonable time, although there is authority in conflict with this view.

§ 238. To What Claims Stipulations Apply

a. Loss or damage due to negligence in general
b. Damages due to delay
c. Failure to deliver and misdelivery
d. Other claims

a. Loss or Damage Due to Negligence in General

In the absence of contravening constitutional, statutory, or contract provisions, stipulations for notice or claim may apply to a loss or injury caused by negligence.

Stipulations for notice or claim may be applicable to a loss or injury caused by negligence in accordance with the view that these stipulations are not a limitation of the carrier's common-law liability and are not in any sense stipulations that the carrier shall be exempted from the effects of its negligence or the negligence of its servants in the performance of those duties assumed in the contract.[98] In other words, these stipulations amount to a condition of recovery and not an exemption from liability.[99] According to some cases, however, a stipulation which does not in terms refer to negligence does not apply where the claim is based on negligence.[1] Of course, no claim for damages need be made in a case based on the carrier's negligence, where the shipping contract expressly exempts or excepts loss, damage, or injury due to negligence from the operation of a provision for filing claim.[2]

As shown in § 236 supra, the provision of the federal statute which prohibited requirements for notice of claims and for filing of claims in certain cases involving carelessness or negligence on the part of the carrier, has been omitted from the statute which now governs the matter.

Damage in transit

In determining whether or not injury to certain horses could be regarded as damage in transit by carelessness or negligence within the meaning of a provision in the shipping contract excepting from the requirement as to making claim cases of such damage, the car containing the horses was to be regarded as having been in transit from the time it was loaded until it was unloaded.—Green v. American Ry. Express Co., Mo.App., 34 S.W.2d 1039.

b. Damages Due to Delay

In the absence of a provision in the stipulation indicating an intention to make the requirement of notice or of claim applicable to special damages due to delay, the stipulation does not, in general, require notice or claim in a case of such damages.

If because of wrongful delay the shipment sustains physical injury and in consequence a depreciation in value, a valid and binding provision in the contract of shipment requiring notice of claim for damages for loss or injury to the shipment or notice of injury is applicable.[3] This principle has found frequent application in the shrinkage in weight of live stock because of a wrongful delay in transportation.[4] On the other hand, while there is authority to the contrary in respect of an interstate shipment,[5] it has frequently been held or recognized that a stipulation for notice or for claim, of this general character, applies only to a loss of, or physical injury to, a shipment of dead freight,[6] or to injury to a shipment of live stock caused by delay and consequent depreciation in value.[7] In other words, where the shipper suffers special damages because of wrongful delay, no compliance with the stipulation is necessary to entitle him to recover for such special damages,[8] and the reason is that the notice would be useless in determining the amount of such loss.[9] In conformity with this principle, it has uniformly been held or recognized that a stipulation that notice of claim or of damages should be a condition precedent to recovery for any injury to the shipment during transportation has no application to damages caused by the loss of market,[10] to loss resulting from a decline in the market value of the shipment,[11] or to the expense of feeding stock, resulting from delay in transportation.[12] No notice is necessary to authorize the recovery of damages from shrinkage resulting from the holding of the cattle after transportation was completed, due to the loss of market.[13] It has also been held that a provision in a bill of lading for a shipment of live stock, requiring notice to the carrier as a condition precedent to any right of action for damages for loss or injuries, delay in transportation, or decline in the market, does not apply to damages to stock while in shipping pens due to the carrier's failure to ship them at once as agreed.[14]

5. Decline in market
(1) In a case which involved an interstate shipment which was made before congress had enacted any statute regulating notice or claim, it was held that compliance with a provision of the contract of shipment for written notice of claims for loss or damage was necessary where the claim was based on delay in transportation resulting in loss due to decline in the market—Goldsmith v. Florida East Coast Ry. Co., 217 Ill. App. 162.

(2) In this connection, the court said that there would be no hardship in requiring the notice; that such notice would put in permanent form the evidence of an intention to claim damages and would serve to call the attention of the carrier to that fact with resultant opportunity to investigate—Goldsmith v. Florida East Coast Ry. Co., 217 Ill.App. 162.

Some stipulations requiring the making of claims in writing within a specified time are sufficiently broad to include claims for delay in transit or transportation,[15] and it has been held that, where the provision requiring notice is not confined to loss of, or injury to, live stock covered by the contract, but expressly includes damages for delay, it must be construed as including a loss sustained by a decline in the market;[16] and that a provision in a bill of lading to the effect that claims for loss, damage, or delay must be made in order to render the carrier liable was not limited to claims for damages to the goods shipped, but extended to damages from delay whereby apples which the consignee intended to pack in the barrels shipped could not be picked until after they were overripe and injured for storage purposes.[17]

c. Failure to Deliver and Misdelivery

Stipulations for notice or claim do not usually apply to cases of nondelivery in the absence of specific provision covering the matter.

In the absence of a specific provision of the contract in respect of failure to deliver, it has frequently been held or recognized that stipulations of the character under consideration have no application where the goods are never delivered.[18] This principle has been applied in case of a conversion of the goods by the carrier.[19] So, it has been held

15. N Y—Lissberger v. Bush Terminal R. Co., 197 N.Y.S. 281, 119 Misc. 691.

Uniform shipping contract

(1) The necessity for making a written claim in accordance with the terms of the uniform express receipt covering an interstate shipment made in 1918 was apparently recognized where the claim was for loss in market value due to delay in transportation and there was no showing of loss or damage due to delay caused by carelessness or negligence.—Barrett v. Van Pelt, 45 S Ct. 437, 268 U.S. 85, 69 L Ed. 857, reversing Van Pelt v Barrett, 199 N.Y S. 509, 205 App Div. 332.

(2) But, in considering a similar provision in a bill of lading, the court, in a case in which the question as to the necessity of making a claim was not presented, said, "if we understand the quoted provision concerning the presentation of claim for damages, appellee [shipper] was not required to file or present any claim before commencing suit."—Ross v. Fear-Campbell Co., 147 N.E. 720, 88 Ind.App. 527.

(3) In considering the terms of a bill of lading similar to those of the above uniform express receipt, it was held that a claim based on delay in transportation was not a loss, damage, or injury "due to delay or damage while being loaded or unloaded," within the meaning of the provision excepting such loss, damage, or injury from the requirement of making a written claim, where claimant did his own unloading and there was no claim in respect of loading or unloading—Lissberger v. Bush Terminal R. Co., 197 N.Y S. 281, 119 Misc. 691.

(4) Nor was such claim for delay in transportation a claim within the exception of "damages in transit by carelessness or negligence"—Lissberger v. Bush Terminal R Co, supra.

(5) In a comparatively recent case, the view has been expressed that as to delays in transit, under the uniform bill of lading presentation of a claim is an essential condition precedent to the right to recover for damages resulting therefrom, and that, as to delays in loading and unloading, presentation of a claim is not a prerequisite—Lays Bros & Boss v. American Ry. Express Co., 239 N Y.S 478, 228 App Div 746

Live stock

(1) Live stock which died in transit was not within the terms of a stipulation between the shipper and the carrier for notice of claim for damages before the stock was removed or mingled with others —Kansas, etc, R Co v. Ayers, 38 S W 515, 63 Ark 331—10 C J p 335 note 95 [a].

(2) Live stock that is removed from the car during the course of the shipment, and not delivered at destination, is not within a clause of the contract of shipment requiring the shipper, as a condition precedent to his right to recover any loss, damage, or injury caused by the carrier, to give notice in writing to the delivering carrier of any visible or manifest injury to the live stock before same is removed from the possession of the carrier or mingled with other live stock —Deming v. Missouri, K & T R. Co., 281 P. 240, 138 Okl 276

(3) The provision in a contract which covered an interstate shipment, requiring the shipper, as a condition precedent to recovery of damages for delay in transit or for loss or injury to the stock, to give notice in writing of his claim to some officer or station agent of defendant "within 90 days after delivery of such stock at destination," was not applicable where it appeared that the stock was never delivered at destination and damages claimed were for nondelivery —Morrell v. Northern Pac Ry. Co., 179 N.W 922, 924, 46 N D 535.

(4) In reaching the foregoing conclusion the court cited Corpus Juris. —Morrell v. Northern Pac R. Co., supra.

Demand for excessive rate and refusal to deliver

Where railroad company sold hay to enforce its lien for freight and other charges after refusal to deliver same on being tendered lawful rate, it was held, in action to recover value of hay at destination on day of arrival, that action was not barred by failure to file claim in writing within four months as provided by bill of lading. —Temple v Southern R. Co, 129 S E 815, 190 N C 438.

Claim after delivery

Stipulation for presentation of claim a specified time after delivery did not apply to a case where the consignee refused to receive the property on the ground that it was not tendered in proper condition.—Gulf, etc, R. Co. v. Golding, 3 Tex A Civ Cas. § 33

Action in tort

The view has been taken that the presentation of a claim in writing within ninety days from the date of loss was not a condition precedent to an action against the broker for conversion, notwithstanding the shipping contract provided that the carrier would not be liable unless claim for loss, damage, or detention was presented in writing within nine-

that the stipulation does not apply in case of a misdelivery.[20]

A stipulation which makes specific provision for making claim in writing within a specified time after a reasonable time for delivery has elapsed, in the case of failure to make delivery, is given effect if otherwise reasonable and valid,[21] and, in an action on a shipping contract providing for notice or claim in case of failure to make delivery, such notice or claim is a condition precedent in an action based on a misdelivery of the goods.[22] A stipula-

Interstate shipment

(1) The rule stated in the text was applied where property shipped by express under a receipt which was in conformity with the applicable federal statute was lost and was never delivered.

Pa.—U. S. Metallic Packing Co. v. American Ry. Express Co., 87 Pa. Super. 119.

(2) In the case of an interstate shipment of currency, part of which was not delivered, it was held that the loss through theft was not "damage in transit by carelessness or neglect" and did not, therefore, fall within an exception to a stipulation requiring the making of claim—Ex parte American Ry. Express Co., 106 So. 197, 213 Ala. 151, granting certiorari Farmers' & Merchants' Bank of Samson v. American Ry. Express Co., 106 So. 195, 21 Ala.App. 133.

(3) Where the claim was based on an absolute loss of goods, it was not a claim for loss, damage, or injury "due to delay or damage" and was not within an exception in the uniform bill of lading.—Allen v. Davis, 118 S.E. 614, 125 S.C. 256.

(4) Shipper who did not file claim with carrier as required by stipulation in bill of lading for loss of goods stolen in transit and did not show any negligence of carrier could not recover.—Douglas Shoe Co. v. Pere Marquette Ry. Co., 217 N.W. 12, 241 Mich. 297.

(5) A claim for a shortage in the weight of the goods below that stated in the bill of lading has been regarded as a "claim for loss" within the meaning of a provision as to written claim for loss in a bill of lading issued under the Federal Bill of Lading Act for an interstate shipment.—Stevens-Scott Grain Co. v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 221 P. 1117, 115 Kan. 188.

(6) The provision in question was applicable to a claim for the loss of a portion of a package of goods, due to theft in transit and consequent failure to deliver.—Kahn v. American Railway Express Co., 106 S.E. 126, 88 W.Va. 17.

(7) Where an interstate shipment of household goods was not delivered to shipper and consignee on arrival but was sent to storage warehouse, the shipper's claim for the value of the goods, asserted in an action for trespass, was not within the exceptions in the uniform bill of lading from the requirement of making claim within a specified time after a reasonable time for delivery.—Hilbert v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 120 A. 778, 277 Pa. 105.

(8) In an action against a common carrier for failure to notify the consignor of nondelivery, failure to present a formal bill as a claim for damages within the time limited in the contract was not fatal, where defendant was notified in writing that the consignor had a claim against them and insisted on its payment; such notification having been given in due time.—Stoddard Lumber Co. v. Oregon-Washington R. & Nav. Co., 165 P. 363, 84 Or. 399, 4 A.L.R. 1275.

Refusal of consignee to accept

Consignee's refusal to accept goods constituted a "failure of delivery," requiring filing of claim as condition precedent to recovery by shipper.—Watts v. Southern Ry. Co., 138 S.E. 290, 139 S.C. 516, certiorari denied 47 S.Ct. 764, 274 U.S. 749, 71 L.Ed. 1331.

tion requiring the making of claim in writing within a specified time after a reasonable time for delivery has elapsed applies to a claim based on a conversion by the carrier by the sale of the property.[23] So, the view has been taken that such stipulation and similar stipulations apply to a claim based on a conversion by a misdelivery,[24] but it has been held that such stipulation does not apply where the action sounds in tort for conversion based on the shipper's delivery to consignee, notwithstanding the consignor's attempted stoppage in transitu.[25]

d. Other Claims

Whether or not stipulations for notice or for claim are required sometimes depends on whether or not the loss or injury involved occurred in the course of transportation and while the shipping contract was in force.

A stipulation for a written claim for damages which may accrue under the contract, within a specified time after removal of the shipment, is controlling as to any liability arising from the beginning to the end of the transportation covered by the shipping contract;[26] and, in respect of interstate shipments, the view has been taken that a stipulation for notice of claim applies to injuries to live stock occasioned by delay at the pens before loading into cars.[27] It has been held or recognized, however, that stipulations for notice do not apply to damages for failure to comply with a statutory duty to furnish cars,[28] or to damages for failure to comply with a contract to furnish cars at a specified time and place,[29] even though the shipment is interstate.[30] It has been held to apply,

Effect of Bill of Lading Act

The failure of the holder of a bill of lading to make claim for misdelivery of goods within the time specified in the bill of lading is not excused by Bill of Lading Act § 10, 39 U.S.St. at L. p. 540, c. 415, 49 U.S.C.A. § 90, which imposes a rule of liability merely for such misdelivery, which rule of liability is not inconsistent with Act March 4, 1915, 38 U.S.St. at L. p. 1196, c. 176, § 20, 49 U.S.C.A. § 20 par. 30. Tenn.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Shipley, 245 S.W. 524, 147 Tenn. 40.

Live stock

(1) Even in the case of an interstate shipment, a bill of lading for a carload of live stock, which recited that the live stock had been received by the carrier and that the shipper had examined the car furnished him, and which otherwise used the future tense, by its grammatical construction excluded the idea that it was intended to affect the rights of the

however, when the promise or agreement to furnish a car was a mere fact or incident of the contract to carry and deliver.[31] There is authority for the view that a stipulation for making written claim for loss or damage within a specified time after delivery applies to a claim for damage to the goods shipped which occurred before they were loaded.[32]

According to some cases, stipulations of the type here under consideration do not apply to damage occurring before execution of the contract.[33] So, a stipulation for notice of claim of loss or injury does not apply where the carrier abandons the contract of shipment and returns the property to shipper at the place of consignment over the protest of the shipper.[34] The view has been taken that, where the carrier was the first to discover injury to live stock and unloaded the animals and terminated the shipment prematurely without notice to the shipper, failure to give notice in writing of visible or manifest injury before removal of the animals from the possession of the carrier, under a stipulation of the shipping contract, does not defeat a recovery.[35] On the theory that a stipulation for a written claim for loss or damage to live stock within a specified time after removal from cars refers to some physical impairment of, or injury to, the animals,[36] such stipulation does not apply to a claim to recover for a breach by the carrier to permit the removal of the animals at an intermediate point for sale,[37] nor to a claim based on the carrier's noncompliance with quarantine regulations with resultant loss to the shipper due to reduced price received for the animals.[38]

There is authority for the view that stipulations of the type here under consideration do not apply to a claim for loss of animals which died during the transportation, of which fact the carrier had actual knowledge,[39] or to injuries to live stock apparent after they had been kept at the quarantine yards for several days and dipped by the carrier's servants under government supervision.[40] It has been held, however, that a stipulation for a demand or claim in writing for loss or damage within a specified time after the unloading of live stock includes all loss and damage by injury or death en route as well as at terminals.[41]

These stipulations do not usually at least apply to losses for which the carrier stipulates that it is not to be liable;[42] or to injury to any articles other than those which the provisions of the contract designate.[43] It has been held that a stipulation requiring a shipper of stock to give notice of any claim for damages before the stock was removed from its place of destination does not apply to removal by the carrier or its servants, but only to parties prior to the time the car was furnished, so that the provision requiring notice of claim for damages did not require such notice of claim for damages caused by breach of contract to furnish the car at the time agreed on.—Southern Ry. Co v. Shipley, 245 S.W. 524, 147 Tenn. 40.

(2) The rule applied even if the Carmack amendment requiring a carrier receiving property for transportation to issue a bill of lading therefor, required the issuance of the bill of lading on the delivery of live stock to the carrier's stock pen for shipment—Southern Ry. Co. v. Shipley, supra.

Loss from failure to furnish car

Under the Hepburn Act of June 29, 1906, U S Comp.St. § 8563[2], as well as the subsequent Carmack amendment, U S.Comp St. §§ 8604a, 8604aa, an agreement by an express company, which is included in the term "common carrier" as defined by the Hepburn Act, to furnish a car for an interstate shipment, is not an independent contract separate and distinct from the contract of shipment; so, where the car was not furnished within the time required, and loss resulted, recovery cannot be had where notice was not given within the four-month period fixed by the rules of the Interstate Commerce Commission, for congress included in the term "transportation" all preliminary services.—Cecil v. Live stock

The rule stated in the text was applied where the contract of shipment provided for notice of claim for loss or injury to live stock before removal from place of destination or of delivery and before mingling with other animals, since such provision was intended to apply only to a case where the carrier transported the stock to the place of destination named in the contract or to some other place of delivery voluntarily selected by the shipper.—Louisville & N R Co v. removal by the shipper or owner;[44] nor does such a stipulation apply where the injury complained of is the delivering of animals different from those shipped.[45]

As to the carrier's conduct as warehouseman, it has been both asserted[46] and denied[47] that such stipulations apply.

These stipulations have been held applicable to shipments beyond the carrier's line as well as to shipments to points on its own line.[48]

Money received. A stipulation of the character under consideration has been held inapplicable to a claim for the carrier's failure or neglect to pay the shipper the amount collected from the consignee for the goods.[49]

§ 239. Requisites and Sufficiency of Notice

Substantial compliance with a stipulation requiring claim or notice is sufficient

As regards the sufficiency of the notice of a claim, or of a claim, for loss of, or injuries to, property shipped, the stipulation requiring such notice or claim is given a reasonable construction,[50] and it is very generally held or recognized that no particular form of notice or of claim is necessary,[51] that neither formality[52] nor technical exactness[53] is necessary, and that a substantial compliance with the stipulation is all that is required.[54] It "is ad-

The provisions of a bill of lading that suits for loss or damage to shipment must be brought within a specified time, and that notice of loss or damage must be filed in writing within a certain time, do not cover a loss in an action for conversion against the last carrier of an interstate shipment shipped under order bill of lading by plaintiff to its order, "Notify B.," where the defendant's agent, without bill of lading being presented, delivered the goods, received full payment, and absconded with the money.—M. Claim

Purpose to make claim or hold carrier liable

(1) Use of the words "I will claim," instead of "I do claim," in a notice of claim against a carrier for injuries to a stock shipment, will be regarded as technical, and not substantial, defect under a provision in an interstate bill of lading requiring claim to be presented within a certain time, especially where the dressed to a practical exigency and it is to be construed in a practical way."[55] In the absence of any requirement therefor in the stipulation, a claim need not set forth all particulars[56] and it is not insufficient merely because there is no formal demand for money damages[57] nor because it does not set forth the damages claimed.[58] If it is presented in time and in the form required, it is sufficient if it gives the carrier reasonable notice of the character of the demand.[59] Where a claim sufficient in substance is filed within the time limited by the contract, the fact that another claim is filed after the expiration of the time fixed will not prevent a recovery under the first claim.[60]

There must be at least a substantial compliance with the stipulations here under consideration,[61]

claim was fully and properly investigated by the carrier—Union Pac. R Co v Pacific Market Co, 200 P. 108, 27 Wyo 501, rehearing denied 206 P 143, 28 Wyo. 461

(2) Where damaged shipments had been inspected by agents of carrier and consignee, and inspection report and notation on freight receipt made, notice that consignee would file claim for damages, though in future tense, was sufficient, in connection with matters referred to in the notice, including the inspection report, to satisfy requirement of bill of lading, covering interstate shipment, for claim in writing—E H Emery & Co v. Wabash R Co, 166 N.W. 600, 183 Iowa 687.

(3) Notice that customer would not accept shipment unless delivered at once, and that it would be necessary to enter claim with railroad company covering it was a sufficient notice of claim for damages for loss of misdelivered goods—Fisk Rubber Co of New York v. New York, N. H. & H R. R, 132 N E 714, 240 Mass. 40.

(4) Notification to the carrier by telegram containing shipping directions that shipper of live stock would hold it liable for damages was a sufficient compliance with the shipping contract requiring claim of damages to be made within a specified time—Boyd v. King, 167 N W. 901, 201 Mich 436, certiorari denied King v Boyd, 39 S Ct. 11, 248 U S. 572, 63 L Ed 427.

(5) Telegram stating, "We will make claim against railroad for entire contents of car at invoice price Must refuse shipment as we cannot handle," was sufficient notice, in view of other telegrams between the parties whereby the shipment had been adequately identified—Georgia, F & A Ry Co v Blish Milling Co, 36 S Ct. 541, 241 U S. 190, 60 L Ed 948, affirming 82 S E 184, 15 Ga App. 112

(6) Shipper who, on day following delivery of shipment of meat, sent carrier's agent, at place of delivery, letter specifying shipment and notifying agent that meat was in spoilt condition, that claim would be filed and that investigation of cause of damage should be made, substantially complied with the provision in bill of lading requiring claim in writing—Cudahy Packing Co v Bixby, 205 S W 865, 199 Mo App. 589 certiorari denied, 39 S Ct. 19, 248 U S 577, 63 L Ed. 429.

Typographical error

Shipper's timely claim for damages to a shipment of live stock was not invalid because "1907" instead of "1913" was written therein as the date of the shipment where the statements in the claim were sufficient to identify the shipment.—Baird v. Denver & R. G. R. Co, 162 P. 79, 49 Utah 58.

Direction for reshipment

Shipper's letter to carrier, requesting reshipment after consignee's refusal to accept delivery, was not claim for loss—Watts v Southern Ry. Co., 138 S E 290, 139 S C. 516, certiorari denied 47 S Ct. 764, 274 U. S. 749, 71 L Ed 1331

Correspondence between carrier and shipper

Requirement in bill of lading that claims for loss, damage, or delay should be presented within stipulated time was not complied with by correspondence between carrier and shipper relating to lost consignment.—Kusin v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co, 270 S.W. 597, 168 Ark. 293.

Statements insufficient

Statements by a stock shipper in conversation that the animals did not need dipping, and would shrink if dipped, was not a notice of claim within a provision in an interstate bill of lading requiring notice of claim of damages to be made within ten days, such conversation taking place before any substantial injury was suffered, and not directing carrier's attention to any act of negligence by which the shipper claimed he was injured.—Union Pac. R Co. v. Pacific Market Co, 200 P 108, 27 Wyo. 501, rehearing denied 206 P. 143, 28 Wyo 461.

Failure to notify of arrival as notice of loss

Shipper's contention that carrier's failure to notify him of the arrival of goods at destination was notice to carrier of the loss of the goods, and that therefore the purpose of the shipping contract requirement and, according to some cases, where the shipping contract requires the making of a claim, the notice given must possess the characteristics of a claim; that is to say, it must amount to a demand for compensation, or it must give notice of an intention to claim compensation for loss sustained,[62] and must furnish sufficient information as to the character of the claim.[63] So it has been held or recognized that the giving of information to the carrier's agent that the shipper will present a claim for damages,[64] calling the attention of the carrier's agent to the condition of animals shipped,[65] a mere inquiry requesting that the property shipped be traced,[66] even though the inquiry states the supposed value of the shipment,[67] or a mere statement to an agent of the carrier that the shipment was in bad condition, without in any way suggesting that the carrier was responsible for that condition, or that anyone was claiming that it was,[68] is not sufficient. The necessity of compliance with a stipulation for the presentation of a definite claim in writing specifying the character and amount of claim has been recognized.[69]

It has been stated broadly that the fact that the carrier made an investigation as to an injury to property shipped has no bearing on the sufficiency of a claim of injury.[70]

Necessity of writing and verification. Unless the contract of shipment requires it, the notice need not be in writing.[71] Where, however, the contract requires a written notice or a written claim, oral notice or claim will not in general suffice.[72] In the case of an intra-state shipment, however, the view has been taken that, while the agent for the carrier is not bound to recognize an oral notice of claim,[73] if he does recognize such notice, it is sufficient.[74] that presentation of a written claim be made within four months as a condition precedent to recovery, was thereby sufficiently complied with, was untenable.—Apostolou v. American Ry. Express Co., 122 A. 326, 81 N.H. 115.

Notations insufficient

Where consignees claimed shortage of three boxes of shoes, written notation, by delivering carrier's agent, on freight and expense bills, that shipment checked three cases short, in connection with verbal notice by consignee, did not constitute claim for loss made to delivering carrier. —Schaff v. Oral request to trace shipment

(1) The fact that the carrier sent out a written tracer for the shipment, on the oral request of claimant, does not constitute compliance with a stipulation for making claim in writing within a specified time. —Carbic Mfg. Co. v. Western Express Co., 184 N.W. 35, 149 Minn. 467.

(2) But, even in the case of an interstate shipment, there is authority for the view that, where the shipper made an oral complaint and the carrier promised to send tracers and to make an investigation and complied with such promise, there was a compliance with a stipulation for a claim in writing.—Shark v. Great Northern Ry. Co., 164 N.W. 39, 37 N.D. 342.

Oral notice to clerk

In respect of an interstate shipment, it has been held that oral notice to a clerk in the office of a carrier was not a compliance with a provision for notice in writing of a claim for loss or injury.—Bryan v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 93 S.E. 750, 174 N.C. 177.

73. Ga.—Heath v. Sandersville R. Co., 98 S.E. 92, 23 Ga.App. 255.

74. Ga.—Heath v. Sandersville R. Co., supra.

While it has been held that a verification of the claim is required by the contract, such verification is a condition precedent to the right to recover,[75] there is authority for the view that, where there has been a substantial compliance with a stipulation for making a claim, the fact that it is not verified by the affidavit of the shipper or his agent, as provided in the stipulation, does not of itself defeat a recovery,[76] especially where the carrier did not insist on a verification.[77]

The foregoing rules as to the necessity of writing and verification should be considered in connection with the rules as to what are valid excuses for failure to comply with stipulations, considered below in § 240, and as to waiver, considered below in § 241.

Delivery receipt in general. It has been held or recognized that a delivery receipt executed by the consignee or shipper may not be regarded as a written claim,[78] even though it contains a notation concerning a shortage.[79] The view has been taken, however, that, where a contract for shipment of cattle stipulates that, as a condition precedent to the shipper's right to recover damages for their injury, he will give written notice of his claim to the carrier before removal from destination, the shipper's failure to give a formal written notice of his intention to demand compensation will not preclude recovery, where he signed a receipt for the cattle at destination "under protest," because of their damaged condition.[80]

Bringing suit. Where the shipping contract provides for giving written notice of claim, or a written claim for loss, damage, or injury within a specified time, bringing or filing suit on the claim, within the time specified is a sufficient compliance.[81]

Notice of claim for less amount than sued for. In the absence of a provision to the contrary, it is no defense to an action for loss or injury that the claim filed, with notice of damages to a shipment, was for less than the amount sued for,[82] except possibly where the sum claimed has been tendered in settlement;[83] the parties seeking to recover are not confined to any special amount by the contract, but are merely required to give notice, in order that the carrier may investigate before the witnesses or the evidence is beyond its reach.[84] Claimant cannot recover more than the amount set forth in his written claim, however, where the contract so provides.[85]

By whom served or given. Ordinarily notice or claim of loss should be given the carrier by the person, if any, designated in the stipulation.[86] Where the bill of lading required the shippers to serve notice of a claim for injuries to live stock, the

Transfer from railroad to steamship
Shipper's receipt given railroad company in exchange for steamship receipts received by such company on delivery of billets of copper to steamship company, reading: "Ten (10) billets . . . in dispute. Local agent of another carrier
Under a stipulation requiring the claim to emanate from claimant or his authorized agent, where the consignee made claim to the wrong carrier, a letter written by the local agent of such carrier to the proper carrier, in connection with the claim, is not equivalent to a substantial compliance with the stipulation Under such circumstances the local agent could not be considered either as agent of initial carrier or consignees in presentation of claim—Schaff v Ike Exstein & Bro., Tex. Civ.App., 270 S.W. 589.

consignee, although he was part owner of the animals and joined in an action to recover for damages, need not serve such notice, it having been served by the shipper.[87] A claim for a loss in transit which is made by the consignee is sufficient provided it is otherwise in conformity with the stipulation, notwithstanding the consignor is the real party in interest.[88] Where the contract does not specify who shall make the claim, a claim made by the consignor has been recognized as sufficient in an action by the consignee.[89] So it has been held or recognized that an effective notice or claim may be given or made by the shipper's attorney,[90] by the factor who sold the goods shipped and who subsequently became owner of the bill of lading by assignment,[91] and by the broker for the shipper.[92]

According to some cases, there is a sufficient compliance with a stipulation requiring written claim where the shipper or consignee orally communicates the facts or makes complaint to the local agent of the carrier and such agent reduces the facts to writing which is sent to his superiors.[93] It has also been held that a report of damages made and signed by an inspector for the carrier, after the consignee has called the inspector's attention to the condition of the shipment, is a sufficient claim in writing.[94] It has been held, however, that there is not a compliance with a requirement for written notice or written claim where the local agent makes a report of a type required of him in every instance of shortage or damage,[95] or where he merely makes a notation as to injuries or damages on the bill or receipt for freight charges.[96]

To what agent notice given. If the contract provides for notice to the carrier's general freight agent, notice to the general claim agent will not suffice.[97] A notice given to the depot manager at the place of destination may be sufficient, however, where such complaints are customarily made to him.[98] Notice of injury to a shipment of live stock given to an employee of the carrier who had charge of the unloading and delivery of the cattle is sufficient notice to the carrier,[99] but merely calling attention of an employee of the carrier to the condition of animals is not sufficient where such employee does not have authority to receive notice or to deal with the matter.[1]

No demand for compensation

A mere communication from a local agent of the type required of him in every instance of shortage or damage which contains no statement that the consignee is demanding, or intends to demand, compensation is not a compliance with a stipulation requiring a written claim, at least where the consignee did not suggest that the agent make the report.—Dworsky v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 289 N.Y.S. 932, 160 Misc. 360.

Interstate shipments

(1) In Missouri it has been held, in the case of an interstate shipment, that the fact that the local agent of the carrier promised to, and did, send a "bad order" report to the company was not sufficient.—O'Briant v. Pryor, Mo.App., 195 S.W. 759.

(2) In an earlier case involving an interstate shipment, the view was taken that a bad order report made by the local agent for the carrier after a discussion with the claimant was sufficient, the court taking the view that the local agent acted as the agent for claimant in such transaction.—McElvain v. Oral mention of damage or loss

Oral mention of damage or loss by shipper of live stock, made to carrier's agent not authorized to receive such notice, was not a compliance with a contract of shipment requiring written notice thereof to be filed with named agents within ten days after delivery.—Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. W. J. Davis & Co., 72 So. 874, 112 Miss. 119.

Filing claim for injuries with the cashier at the office of the carrier at the destination of the shipment, such cashier being in charge of the business in the absence of the agent having general charge, was a sufficient compliance with a requirement that the claim be filed with the agent of the carrier at the point of destination.[2]

Where the agent for a railroad company is also the agent for an express company, a claim against the express company may properly be submitted to such agent.[3]

At what place given. The requirement of a contract of shipment that notice of claim for loss be given at either the point of shipment or of delivery is not satisfied by mailing it to another point.[4] While the view has been taken that the "place of destination," as used in contract requiring a shipper of live stock to give notice of injury before the stock has been removed from the place of destination, cannot be limited to the premises of the carrier, but means the town to which the shipment is made, and the giving of notice before the stock has been removed beyond the limits of the town and mingled with other stock will be sufficient,[5] it has been held that live stock which has been taken several miles from the place where received by the shipper from the carrier is not at the "place of destination" or "place of delivery," so that notice after such removal is not sufficient.[6]

Where a shipper addressed his notice of claim to the building of another railroad company which was a part of defendant's system, and defendant's claim agent replied to the notice, the fact that it was not addressed to defendant is no ground for objecting.[7]

In a stipulation that a claim for loss, damage, or delay must be made in writing to the carrier at the point of delivery or at the point of origin within a specified number of months after the delivery or a reasonable time for delivery, the words "carrier at the point of delivery or at the point of origin" have been regarded as descriptive of the carrier to whom notice is to be given rather than of the place at which notice is to be filed, and, in accordance with this construction, it has been held that a written claim made to the freight claim agent of the carrier at a place other than the point of delivery or of origin is sufficient,[8] but the view has been taken that this does not constitute a compliance with such stipulation[9] and that a like rule applies to a claim filed with a local agent of the carrier at a place other than the point of delivery or of origin.[10] It has been held that, where the carrier has by advice to claimant induced the latter to file his claim with the freight claim agent at a place other than the point of delivery or of origin, the carrier is estopped to assert that the stipulation has not been complied with and such filing may be regarded as sufficient.[11]

Several carriers. Notice to one carrier or to several connecting carriers is not notice to another connecting carrier whom it is sought to hold liable for loss or injury, where, under the contract of shipment, each carrier is liable for damages occurring on its own line.[12] Where an intra-state bill of lading required the filing of claim against the carrier, the filing of a claim against the delivering carrier, not as agent of the initial carrier, was held to be insufficient to support an action against the initial carrier.[13] A notice of claim against railroad companies acting as partners for damages to a shipment of cattle need not, however, be filed with each company; it is sufficient if it is filed with one of them.[14] It has also been held that, where a shipping contract provided that no claim for damages should be allowed unless a verified claim should be made and delivered to the carrier, and that a connecting carrier should not be liable for any damage occurring on its line unless a like claim should be made and delivered to it, the shipper claiming damages from the connecting carrier need not give notice to the initial carrier, but a notice to the connecting carrier is sufficient.[15]

As to interstate shipments, notice to one of several connecting carriers is notice to all, under the Carmack amendment, each carrier being an agent for the other.[16] Even where the contract provided for notice to the carrier at the point of delivery or at the point of origin, it was held that such provision did not render ineffective a claim presented to an intermediate carrier that actually caused the injury to the property shipped.[17] Prior to the enactment of the Carmack amendment, where a contract for the transportation of goods over several lines of railroad provided that notice of claim for injury should be given "to the agent at point of delivery," and the damage occurred while the goods were in the hands of the initial carrier, notice given to the agent of the final or delivering carrier was held to be a sufficient compliance with the terms of the contract,[18] even though the initial or intermediate carrier had an agent at the point of destination.[19]

Time. Where a shipping contract provides that claims in case of failure to make delivery must be made within a specified time after a reasonable time for delivery has elapsed, what constitutes a reasonable time for delivery depends on the circumstances of the particular case,[20] and means such time as is necessary conveniently to transport and make delivery of the shipment in the ordinary course of business, in the light of the circumstances and conditions surrounding the transaction,[21] reasonable time for delivery does not require the lapse of such a period as would indicate a strong probability that the property shipped would never in fact be deliv-

It has been held that, where part of a shipment was lost and was not delivered, the time within which claim must be made commenced to run from the date on which the other part of the shipment was delivered.—Jenckes Spinning Co. v. New York, N.H. & H. R. Co., 129 A. 815, 47 R.I. 72.

ered.[22] This rule applies in the case of a misdelivery.[23]

The time for making demand or claim for loss or damage in respect of a shipment of live stock may, under the particular circumstances, commence to run from the time the animals were unloaded at an intermediate station.[24] Under a stipulation requiring presentation of a written claim for damages within a specified period after it accrued, it has been held that such period began to run from the time of the wrongful delivery on which the claim was based,[25] and not from the time when claimant knew, or in the exercise of due diligence should have known, of the wrongful delivery.[26]

Notification of possible injury to a shipment before injury or damages occurred and before the shipment has reached destination is not a compliance with a stipulation for presenting or making claim within a specific time after unloading.[27]

A stipulation requiring claims to be made on taking delivery has been construed to conclude the consignee only when he has had a reasonable opportunity to examine the property involved.[28] As shown in § 240, infra, a five-day period from removal from cars for filing claims for damages to a shipment of live stock does not begin to run when they are unloaded if an opportunity to inspect them is refused.

§ 240. Excuses for Failure to Give Notice

a. Actual knowledge on part of carrier
b. Impossibility of performance; failure to discover loss or injury
c. Prevention by act of carrier
d. Want of knowledge of stipulation and loss of possession of contract
e. Other excuses

a. Actual Knowledge on Part of Carrier

State courts have frequently held that knowledge of loss or injury on the part of the carrier excuses the giving of notice of claim. As to interstate shipments, the fact that an agent of the carrier has knowledge of loss or injury does not of itself excuse a failure to comply with a stipulation as to notice or claim.

According to the view taken by various state courts, the giving of notice of claim for loss or injury provided for by the shipping contract is excused where the carrier has actual knowledge of loss or injury,[29] as in these circumstances the necessity for notice is obviated.[30] This rule is enforced against a carrier who has had possession of the property, with every opportunity to know the extent of the injury and its cause.[31] Compliance with a requirement for notice of loss or damage is not excused, however, by the fact that some agent or employee of the delivering carrier whose duties did not include the investigation of such matters or the report thereof to some agent in authority knew of the damaged condition of the shipment on arrival at destination, no agent in authority knowing that the shipment was damaged or that a claim for damages was made.[32]

A distinction has been drawn between cases where the contract merely requires notice of loss or damage and an intention to make a claim therefor, and a contract contemplating the presentation of a formal claim for damages, specifying what was lost or damaged and the amount thereof, and in the latter class of cases it has been held or recognized that, although the carrier's agent at the point of delivery was apprised of the loss, the notice required by the contract must nevertheless be given.[33] So, in the case of an intra-state shipment, it has been held that claimant cannot maintain an action for a conversion based on a misdelivery by the carrier without filing a written claim as provided for by the contract, notwithstanding the carrier participated in the wrongful conversion and that some of its employees had knowledge of the wrong and injury.[34]

Interstate shipments. The supreme court of the United States has taken the view that the mere fact that certain agents of the carrier have knowledge of the loss or injury does not relieve claimant from the necessity of reporting or making claim in writing,[35] and other courts have also held or recognized that the agent's knowledge does not of itself dispense with the obligation to comply with a stipulation for making a written claim,[36] for a written notice of claim,[37] or for a written notice of injury.[38] In some of the earlier cases in which interstate shipments were involved, state courts applied the rule that the giving of a written notice of claim for loss or injury is excused where the carried has actual knowledge of loss or injury.[39]

b. Impossibility of Performance; Failure to Discover Loss or Injury

While, according to some cases, impossibility of compliance with a stipulation as to notice or claim may excuse strict compliance, in respect of interstate shipments it has been held that mere failure to discover the loss within the time for making claim fixed by the contract does not excuse noncompliance where the carrier does not prevent the discovery.

According to some cases the shipper is excused from giving notice or making claim within the time specified in the contract, where, with the exercise of reasonable diligence, a compliance with the contract is impossible;[40] especially is this true where

Acquisition of knowledge and termination of shipment
The view was taken that the shipper's right to recover was not defeated by a failure to give written notice of visible or manifest injury to animals before removal from possession of carrier, where carrier was the first to discover injury and unloaded the animals and terminated the shipment prematurely, without notice to the shipper—Morrow v Wabash Ry. the impossibility of performance is caused by the act of the carrier itself, as shown in the following subdivision of this section. To hold that a stipulation required notice of damages to be given before it was discovered, or could by the exercise of ordinary care have been discovered, would be to give the stipulation an unreasonable construction.[41] However, the fact that the shipper notified the carrier of the injury to the goods will not exempt him from the operation of the requirement, where he made no effort to discover the condition of the goods until after the time for giving notice had expired.[42] It has been held, in respect of an interstate shipment, that mere failure to discover the loss within the time for making claim fixed by the shipping contract does not excuse a failure to comply with the requirement where the carrier does not do anything to prevent the discovery of the loss.[43]

While there is authority for the contrary view,[44] it has been held that, even though the time allowed for giving notice or making claim is unreasonably short,[45] or there is a reasonable excuse for not complying with the stipulation,[46] it is none the less necessary that notice should be given within a reasonable time. Notice given within such a reasonably short time as will effectually secure the carrier from fraud will satisfy the requirement of this rule.[47]

c. Prevention by Act of Carrier

An act of the carrier which renders compliance with a stipulation impossible excuses failure to comply.

Failure to give notice in time is excused when some act of the carrier renders it impossible to comply with the stipulation requiring it.[48] A five-day period from removal from cars for filing claims for damages to a shipment of live stock will not begin to run when they are unloaded if an opportunity to inspect them is refused.[49]

d. Want of Knowledge of Stipulation and Loss of Possession of Contract

Want of actual notice of a stipulation in a contract covering an interstate shipment does not necessarily excuse the shipper's noncompliance with such stipulation.

The fact that the shipper did not have actual notice of a stipulation in a contract covering an interstate shipment requiring claim in writing within a specified time does not excuse his failure to comply with such stipulation where the agent of the shipper signed the contract and the tariffs filed by the carrier with the interstate commerce commission provides for such a stipulation.[50] The mere fact that the copy of the contract given to the shipper's agent who accompanied a shipment of live stock was used as transportation on the return trip of said

Notice given when negligence of carrier discovered
(1) It has been held that failure to present claim based on the carrier's delivery of live stock different from, and inferior to, the animals shipped, within the period fixed in the stipulation after removal from cars did not preclude recovery where notice of the claim was given without delay as soon as the negligence of the carrier which occasioned the loss was discovered, in a case in which an interstate shipment was involved—Chesapeake & O. Ry. Co. v. Rebman & Clark, 90 S.E. 629, 120 Va. 71.

(2) But the supreme court of the United States in commenting on the case of Chesapeake & O. Ry. Co. v. agent and was taken up at the end of the trip did not excuse compliance with a stipulation for the giving of notice of claim for damages before removal of animals from place of destination or of delivery.[51] It has been held, however, in the case of an interstate shipment, that the shipper is not bound by a stipulation requiring a claim in writing if he was not given opportunity to ascertain that such stipulation was embodied in the writing and knew nothing of it before his property was loaded and started en route.[52]

e. Other Excuses

According to some cases, failure of the claimant to file claim or notice within the time fixed may be excused by the fact that the carrier undertook to trace the goods or by the fact that a duly authorized agent of the carrier has granted an extension of time.

Where, as soon as he was apprised of the loss, the shipper called on the carrier for an explanation, and time was taken by the carrier in searching for and tracing goods which it finally stated could not be found, such facts excuse the shipper from presenting a formal claim in writing, in compliance with the shipping contract, at an earlier date.[53]

In respect of an interstate shipment, the view has been taken that an extension of time for filing a notice of a claim for loss or injury, granted by a duly authorized agent of the carrier, is valid, and that such an extension does not amount to a violation of the interstate commerce commission's rules and regulations. An extension may be made by indorsing the same on the receipted freight bill delivered to the shipper.[54] This asserted right of an agent to extend the time should, however, be considered with the view taken in more recent cases which deny the power of a carrier to waive stipulations for notice or claim in contracts for interstate shipments, set forth in § 241 infra.

As pointed out in § 241, however, it has frequently been held or recognized that stipulations of the type here under consideration cannot be waived in the case of an interstate shipment.

Custom cannot effect waiver
In a case in which the court apparently recognized the rule stated in the text, the view was expressed that custom of shipper of cotton to delay ascertainment of shortages in shipments until end of busy season could not effect a waiver of stipulation for claim within period required by bill of lading.—Davis v. Rodgers, 124 S.E. 408, 139 Va. 618.

Even prior to the decision in the Blish case, some state courts had determined that a stipulation for written claim in a contract covering an interstate shipment could not be waived.—Kemper Mill Co. v. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co., 186 S.W. 8, 193 Mo.App. 466—Banaka v. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co., 186 S.W. 7, 193 Mo.App. 345—Hull v. Chicago Great Western R. Co., 185 S.W. 1155, 193 Mo.App. 425.

Authority of interstate commerce commission
"It will be readily seen from the statement of the Interstate Commerce Commission itself . . . that that Commission was clearly of the opinion that it had no authority to authorize appellant [carrier] to waive the stipulation in question [claim in writing within four months after delivery], same being a part of its traffic schedule; and if it be true for notice of claim,[56] or for notice of loss or injury,[57] cannot be waived, and that such a waiver would constitute an invalid discrimination, as shown in § 364 infra. Since the decision in Georgia, F. & A. R. Co. v. Blish Milling Co., 36 S. Ct. 541, 241 U.S. 190, 60 L.Ed. 948, some state courts have regarded the rule as settled that there cannot be a waiver of stipulations of the type here under consideration in the case of interstate shipments,[58] but even since such decision some state court decisions have recognized the operative effect of waivers in respect of such stipulations and in the case of interstate shipments.[59] The supreme court of the United States has apparently not made a definite ruling as to the scope and extent of the rule against waiver in interstate cases, and, in a comparatively recent case in which the Blish case was cited with approval and it was held that the carrier was not estopped to claim the benefit of a stipulation requiring a written claim where there had been a misdelivery of the property shipped,[60] the court said that it was unnecessary to decide whether or not under any circumstances the shipper may rely on the doctrine of estoppel to avoid the clause of the contract as to the time for making claim.[61]

Prior to the decision in the Blish case it was very

that the Interstate Commerce Commission had no authority to authorize appellant to waive this stipulation, and if appellant, without such authorization, was without authority to waive the same, then it follows that, from a legal standpoint, there could be no waiver of this stipulation in this bill of lading, either express or by implication; and we are inclined to think that the Interstate Commerce Commission did not, as admitted by it, have the authority to empower appellant, as an interstate commerce carrier, to do that which, under the acts of Congress, appellant was forbidden to do."—Houston E. & W. T. Ry. Co. v. Houston Packing Co., Tex.Civ.App., 203 S.W. 1140, 1144.

View that stipulation may be waived

The view was expressed in a syllabus by the court, in a case involving an interstate shipment, that a carrier may waive the benefit of a limitation as to presentation of written claim by express agreement or inconsistent conduct, but it was held that in the case involved there was not a waiver.—Kahn v. American Railway Express Co., 106 S.E. 126, 88 W.Va. 17.

Delivery contrary to instructions

The fact that delivery was made contrary to instructions, due to the misunderstanding or negligence of the carrier, cannot be set up as an estoppel against the claim of a failure to comply with the requirement of a provision of the contract that a written claim shall be made within a specified time.—Chesapeake & O. Ry. Co. v. Martin, 51 S.Ct. 453, 283 U.S. 209, 75 L.Ed. 983, reversing 143 S.E. 629, 154 Va. 1, and Chesapeake & O. Ry. Co. v. 61. U.S.—Chesapeake & O. Ry. Co. v. Martin, supra.

Facts insufficient to show waiver

With regard to a requirement for a demand or claim in writing within a specified time, the court considered certain circumstances relied on by the shipper to show a waiver and held that such circumstances were inadequate to show a waiver by the carrier of written notice required by the contract—Southern Pac. Co. v. Stewart, Ariz., 39 S.Ct. 139, 248 U.S. 446, 63 L.Ed. 350, reversing 233 F. 956, 147 C.C.A. 630, in which error is dismissed 38 S.Ct. 130, 245 U.S. 359, 62 L.Ed. 345, rehearing granted 38 S.Ct. 203, 254 U.S. 562, 62 L.Ed. 472.

Estoppel

(1) In a case in which it does not appear whether the shipment was interstate or intra-state, it was held that, while the carrier could not waive the provision of the contract for making a written claim within a specified time, it was estopped to set up, in a suit by the shipper, the generally held both in respect of intra-state and interstate shipments that the provision was for the benefit of the carrier and might be waived,[62] in which case the action could not be defeated because of such omission.[63] This principle still applies, in some jurisdictions at least, so far as intra-state shipments are concerned.[64]

It has been stated broadly that the carrier, in order to avail itself of stipulations of this nature, must show that it has done nothing to mislead the shipper or cause him to believe that he has waived the requirement.[65]

b. What Amounts to Waiver

(1) In general
(2) Failure to object to oral notice or claim
(3) Failure to object for want of verification
(4) Rejecting claims or grounds other than want of, or defect in, notice or claim
(5) Misleading claimant as to necessity of notice or claim
(6) Other acts or conduct

(1) In General

Waiver, if permissible, may be express or implied from conduct.

The waiver need not be and seldom is express, but may be implied from the conduct of the carrier.[66] It has been held, however, that, if waiver by conduct is relied on, it must appear that the shipper was caused to occupy a more disadvantageous position than he would have occupied but for that conduct;[67] in other words the conduct of the carrier must have misled claimant to his detriment or prejudice.[68]

Where the requirement as to making a claim for damages within the time and in the manner specified can be waived, it may be waived by failing to object to the form of a defective notice, or by entertaining and proceeding to consider and negotiate with reference to the claim,[69] but it has been held fact that written claim had not been filed within the time fixed where it had prevented the shipper from filing the claim by informing him that the consignee, and not the shipper, was the proper person to file the claim.—Pope v. American Ry. Express Co., 110 S.E. 514, 28 Ga.App. 190.

(2) In the case of an interstate shipment, it has been held that a carrier may be estopped from asserting the insufficiency of a claim which the carrier has treated, and acted on, as sufficient.—S. L. Jones & Co. v. Davis, 223 P. 560, 65 Cal.App. 164.

(3) In a case in which the view was apparently taken that the stipulation for written claim did not apply, there are intimations that if claimant was induced by the carrier to, withhold claim, the latter could not take advantage of a failure to file in time.—Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Fish & Lybarger Co., 155 N.E. 508, 23 Ohio App. 179.

Ruling of interstate commerce commission

In one of the earlier cases involving an interstate shipment, in which it was held that the written notice of claim for damages could be waived, it was also held that the ruling of the interstate commerce commission No. 456 dealing with the form of written notice did not show that there could not be a waiver.—Schloss-Bear-Davis Co. v. Northwestern R. Co. of South Carolina, 105 S.E. 343, 115 S.C. 224.

Notice of injury

In view of the fact that waiver is founded largely on the doctrine of estoppel, the conduct of the carrier must have misled claimant and prevented him from giving notice as to injury to live stock required by the contract, in order that such conduct may constitute a waiver.—International & G. N. R. Co. v. Hudson, Tex.Civ.App., 188 S.W. 277.

Facts not presenting case of waiver

that the mere receipt and investigation of a written claim which is not filed in time does not necessarily constitute a waiver.[70] A waiver of the benefit of a stipulation for written claim may not be predicated on conduct which neither admits liability nor denies it, on receipt of oral notice of loss after expiration of the time fixed, where the carrier later invokes the protection of the stipulation on disclosure of the fact of loss, the time, and the surrounding circumstances.[71]

(2) Failure to Object to Oral Notice or Claim

Waiver of requirement that claim shall be in writing may be effected by the carrier's receiving, and acting on, an oral claim without objection.

Where a waiver is permissible, a carrier by accepting a verbal claim for loss or injury without protest, and by undertaking to deal with the claim, thereby waives the requirement in the contract of shipment that claims shall be in writing,[72] and a like rule applies to a failure to object to an oral notice of claim for damage.[73]

(3) Failure to Object for Want of Verification

Want of verification of a claim may be waived by receiving, and acting on, an unverified claim without objection to absence of verification.

Where waiver is permissible, failure to object to a claim for want of verification in accordance with the contract of shipment, and entering into negotiations for a settlement thereof,[74] or investigating the merits of the claim,[75] or a direct denial of liability for the loss or injury sustained,[76] amounts to a waiver of an objection on the ground that the claim was not verified.

(4) Rejecting Claims or Grounds Other than Want of, or Defect in, Notice or Claim

Rejection of a claim on a particular ground ordinarily is a waiver of other grounds of objection not asserted by the carrier.

Where waiver is permissible, the rejection of a claim on grounds other than noncompliance or an insufficient compliance with a contractual requirement that notice of claim for loss or injury shall be given or claim made operates as a waiver of the contractual requirement.[77] In other words, where the carrier states a specific ground of objection, any other objection which it could have made is waived.[78] There is not a waiver, however, where claimant was not induced to delay action or to act to his injury by the conduct of the carrier.[79]

Goods lost in transit

Investigation and suggestions or directions as to care of property

The right to written notice of damages is waived if after receiving less formal notice, the carrier proceeds to investigate the damage suffered and makes suggestions, or gives directions as to the care or disposition of the damaged property—Bliss v. Southern Pac. Co., 172 P. 760, 36 Cal App. 536.

Retention of claim and rejection on distinct grounds

Although the shipper did not make a claim for damages to goods shipped over its railroad within the time provided by the bill of lading, where the claim filed was retained by defendant almost a year without protest, and defendant placed its refusal to adjust on distinct grounds, it waived the right to insist, after plaintiff had incurred the expense of litigation, on another defense that the claim was not filed within such time—Ithaca Roller Mills v Ann Arbor R. (5) Misleading Claimant as to Necessity of Notice or Claim

In general, conduct of the carrier which misleads the claimant as to the necessity of giving notice constitutes a waiver.

Where waiver is permissible, and the acts of the carrier are such as to mislead the owner of the goods as to the necessity of giving notice, it must be considered to have waived notice.[80] Even though the act of the carrier was unintentional, it cannot claim through the very acts which misled the owner.[81]

(6) Other Acts or Conduct

Waiver may be effected by acts of the carrier or its attorney on the trial of the action based on the claim in question. Correspondence between the carrier and the claimant relative to the claim or the knowledge of the existence of a possible claim, on the part of the carrier's representative, does not necessarily constitute a waiver.

Where waiver is permissible, the requirement of notice is waived where in an action for damages caused by delay defendant moves for a nonsuit, and failure to give the required notice is not made a ground of the motion.[82] Likewise a provision for notice of claim may be waived by express statement of the attorney for defendant carrier at the trial of the action based on the claim.[83] Where the carrier included in his statement of defense the alleged failure of claimant to make claim in writing in accordance with contract stipulation and facts as to the time of making claim were developed in the evidence, there was not a waiver of the stipulation on the part of the carrier.[84]

Where the routing in a shipper's receipt is deviated from by the fault of an initial carrier, it cannot take advantage of a stipulation in the bill of lading concerning the time for giving notice of a claim for damages or valuation of property in case of loss.[85]

A letter from the claim agent of the carrier, written soon after the shipment was lost, admitting the loss and directing the shipper to replace the shipment at the carrier's expense is a waiver of a stipulation for written claim.[86] Sending a letter by the agent of the carrier to the shipper after his failure to file notice of claim within the required time, which does no more than show a possible willingness to treat with the shipper after receiving and examining papers asked for, does not amount to a waiver of the requirement of notice.[87]

The act of the carrier in sending out tracers for a lost shipment after its exemption from liability has attached under a provision of the bill of lading requiring written claim for loss within a specified time is not a waiver of the exemption.[88]

Mere knowledge on the part of the claim agent of a railway company that the shipper claimed damages for injuries to his cattle, unaccompanied by any act on the part of the claim agent looking to the adjustment of the loss, is not sufficient to constitute a waiver of the stipulation requiring the claim to be made in writing within a prescribed time.[89] The mere fact that defendant's veterinary surgeon examined stock transported and reported the result of his examination to one of defendant's officers is not enough to warrant a reasonable inference of the waiver of the stipulation requiring notice.[90]

Where, in an action against a carrier of live stock for shrinkage and loss by decline in the market by delay in transportation, the parties by stipulation fixed the loss by decline in market and the loss from shrinkage, and agreed that the shipment was under a special contract limiting the liability of the carrier, and that the condition of the stock was poor when it arrived at destination too late for the market on the day of arrival, the stipulation was held not a waiver of notice by the shipper of loss from shrinkage.[91]

c. Time for Waiver

There is authority both in support of and also against the view that the acts constituting the alleged waiver must occur before the time limited for compliance with the stipulation has expired.

In a number of decisions it is held that acts relied on to constitute a waiver of a contractual reforming to answers to certified questions 90 S.E. 527, 146 Ga. 68.

quirement as to notice must occur before the expiration of the time limited for giving notice; otherwise they do not amount to a waiver.[92] The weight of authority, however, is to the contrary,[93] the view being taken that "it is inconsistent with the claim of immunity from liability that it should recognize any obligation to the plaintiff after the expiration" of the time limited for presenting the notice.[94]

d. Who May Waive for Carrier

In general, agents authorized to receive, on behalf of the carrier, claims for damages may, under certain circumstances, waive stipulations here under consideration if waiver is otherwise permissible.

Where waiver is permissible in general, agents authorized to receive claims or notice for damages have power to waive compliance by acts or conduct reasonably calculated to induce the shipper to believe that written notice would not be required.[95] There is authority for the view that a station agent without express authority has no power to waive a stipulation in a contract of shipment requiring notice of claim for loss or damages,[96] and, in the case of an interstate shipment, the right of an agent of the delivering carrier to waive by his conduct, in connection with the fact that he had oral notice of the claim, a verified written claim has been denied.[97]

In case of connecting carriers, it has been held that the terminal carrier does not have power as agent of the initial carrier to bind the initial carrier by a custom or agreement waiving a stipulation that notice of claim be filed within a certain time.[98]

e. Contractual Prohibition against Waiver

A provision of the shipping contract that no agent of the carrier may waive any of its provisions applies to a stipulation for notice of claim.

A provision in a shipping contract that no agent of the carrier shall have power to waive any of its provisions is valid,[99] and under a provision of this character it has been held or recognized that no agent of the carrier has power to waive a requirement that notice of claim for damages shall be given.[1] There is authority for the view, however, that an agent authorized to receive notice may waive notice even though there is a stipulation attempting to limit the authority of the agent with regard to waiver.[2] Furthermore it seems that the unauthorized act of the agent in assuming to waive a requirement of this nature may be ratified by the carrier in a case in which waiver is permissible generally.[3]

Interstate shipment

(1) In a case involving an interstate shipment, in which the court apparently took the view that in any event the carrier could not waive the requirement that a claim in writing, verified by the shipper or his agent, should be made within a specified time, it was held that where a claim was presented long after the period specified, the fact that the carrier, investigated the claim and rejected it without objecting to want of verification was not a waiver of such provision of the contract. —Herran v. Chicago & E. R. Co., 135 N.E. 253, 78 Ind.App. 253.

(2) Where defense of failure to present claim within time specified in shipping contract covering interstate shipment was complete when loss of goods through wrongful delivery was first brought to attention of road, road could not waive it by investigating claim and rejecting it on ground different than that of failure to give notice—Harelson v. a. In General

In general a provision in a contract of shipment limiting the period in which action may be brought is valid and binding even though the period is less than that fixed by the statute of limitations.

In the absence of constitutional or statutory prohibition, it is usually held or recognized that it is competent for the parties to a contract of shipment to agree on a limitation of time[4] shorter than the statutory period,[5] within which action for breach of the contract shall be brought, and such a limitation will be enforced if reasonable, although there is some authority to the contrary.[6]

Stipulations of this character are not opposed to public policy,[7] and do not operate as a restriction on the common-law liability of the carrier.[8] In respect of an intra-state shipment however, it has been held that a stipulation of the type here considered is not binding on a claimant unless there was a consideration therefor, either in a reduction in rate or some other special inducement.[9]

Broadly speaking, a valid and binding stipulation of the type here under consideration takes the place of the statute of limitations[10] and is governed by the same rules.[11] In order to be effective the limitation must be reasonable;[12] and it has been said

Amendments to petition
Where petition against initial carrier for conversion of goods by delivering carrier was amended, so as to change the cause of action from tort to contract, more than two years and one day after delivery of goods, within which bill of lading required actions to be brought, to claim damages for breach of contract, it was barred by limitation—Illinois Cent. R Co. v. Stimson, 268 S.W. 835, 207 Ky. 78.

Government bill of lading
(1) Government bill of lading covering intra-state shipment providing that, unless otherwise specifically provided therein, it was subject to same rules and conditions as govern commercial shipments under carrier's usual forms, incorporated as condition thereof a provision of carrier's usual bill of lading requiring suits for loss, damage, or delay to be instituted within two years and one day after delivery of the property, or after a reasonable time for delivery has elapsed, in the absence of any contrary provision therein.—U. S. v. Seaboard Air Line Ry. Co., C.C.A.Va., 22 F.2d 113.

(2) Such provision of the carrier's usual bill of lading was valid where it covered an intra-state shipment made before the enactment of the federal Transportation Act of 1920.—U. S. v. Seaboard Air Line Ry. Co., supra.

Stipulation construed
In a bill of lading providing that, "except where the loss, damage, or injury complained of is due to delay or damage while being loaded or unloaded, or damage in transit by carelessness or negligence, as condition precedent to recovery, claims must be made in writing to the originating or delivering carrier within six months after delivery of the property, or, in case of failure to make delivery, then within six months after reasonable time for delivery has elapsed, and suit for loss, damage, or delay shall be instituted within two years and one day after delivery of the property, or, in case of a failure to make delivery, then, within two years and one day after a reasonable time for delivery has elapsed," the exception in the bill as to damage to property in transit applies only to the notice in writing of the claim required to be given to the originating or delivering carrier, and does not relate to the time in which suit must be commenced.—Farr v St. Louis Southwestern Ry. Co., 243 S W. 800, 154 Ark 585.

that the only limitations as to the validity of such contracts are that they must be reasonable,[13] and that there must be prompt action on the part of the carrier in denying its liability, to the end that the shipper may be duly apprised of the fact that suit will be necessary.[14] In respect of a carrier subject to the control of congress but not made subject to the provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act, the view has been expressed that the standards fixed by such act are relevant in determining whether or not a stipulation limiting the time for bringing suit is reasonable.[15]

The mere fact that the shipper did not read the shipping contract containing a stipulation of the character here under consideration does not prevent his being bound by the limitation.[16]

A failure to bring suit within the time fixed by the stipulation will not affect the shipper's right of recovery where it can be made to appear that the failure to sue was caused by the fraud or misrepresentation of the carrier or its agent, whereby the shipper was induced to delay his suit until the time had expired.[17] According to some cases, however, actual fraud is necessary in order to prevent the operation of the contractual limitation,[18] that is, there must be such fraud as involves moral turpitude,[19] and the mere fact that the carrier neither paid nor declined to pay the claim within the period of limitation is not sufficient.[20] Of course, where the stipulation provides that suit shall be instituted not later than a certain time after notice in writing is given by the carrier to claimant that the carrier has disallowed the claim, it does not apply where the carrier has not given such notice of rejection of the claim.[21]

To what claim stipulations applicable. Some limitations of the character under consideration are not applicable to actions for damages due to delay,[22] or to actions against a carrier not strictly for the loss of, or damage to, the goods during transportation.[23] So the view has been taken that a live stock shipping contract which provides that no claim for damages can be enforced unless suit is brought within six months after the injury relates only to such injuries as occur while the stock is in transit, and does not apply to damages sustained by the escape of the stock from the stockyards while awaiting shipment.[24]

According to some cases, a stipulation requiring suits for loss, damage, or delay to be brought within a specified time after delivery, or after a reasonable time for delivery has elapsed, applies to a suit based on a failure to deliver either because of misdelivery or refusal to deliver,[25] to a suit by the holder of a bill of lading against the carrier to recover for a shortage measured by the difference in weight of the commodity delivered and the weight as shown on the bill of lading,[26] and to a suit based on damage in transit by carelessness or negligence.[27] So a stipulation for limitation of the time to sue may control notwithstanding claimant's action is based on the carrier's common-law liability.[28]

The suit described in the text was a suit for a "loss" within the meaning of the stipulation.—Leigh Ellis

It has been held that the fact that the carrier diverted the shipment from the consignee and delivered it to another does not give the consignee the right to disregard a valid and binding provision of the contract limiting the time within which action should be brought,[29] but in respect of an intrastate shipment it has been held that the carrier cannot claim the benefit of a provision of the contract requiring the shipper to bring his action within a specified limited period where the carrier abandoned the contract by making a misdelivery and the shipper sues in tort for the conversion.[30]

What constitutes commencement of action. Issuance of the summons constitutes the commencement of the action within the meaning of a provision of a shipping contract of the type here under consideration, and, where the summons is issued within the period fixed by such provision, the provision is satisfied. Even though the action is brought in a county in which service of summons cannot be had and jurisdiction obtained other than by appearance of defendant carrier, waiver of service by appearance relates back to the commencement of the action so as to satisfy the contract provision.[31]

Running of statutory limitation. A stipulation that suits for loss, damage, or delay shall be instituted only within a specified time after delivery, or, in case of failure to make delivery, within such specified time after a reasonable time for delivery has elapsed has been construed to mean that such suits are to be instituted only within the specified time after delivery when delivered within a reasonable time, or, in case of failure to make delivery within a reasonable time, then within the specified time after a reasonable time for delivery has elapsed.[32] What constitutes a reasonable time within the meaning of a stipulation that, in case of failure to make delivery, suit shall be commenced within a specified time after a reasonable time for delivery has elapsed depends on the facts of the particular case.[33] Where such a stipulation is valid and binding on the parties, claimant may not successfully maintain the claim that the period of limitation commences to run from the time claimant was notified by the carrier of the denial of the claim.[34]

Where the contract period of limitation commences to run from the time that notice in writing is given by the carrier that the claim is disallowed in whole or in part, it is not necessary for the carrier to state in so many words, or in the language of the contract, that the claim is disallowed either in whole or in part;[35] it is sufficient if the carrier uses such terms as convey to claimant the information that the claim is disallowed.[36] Where the carrier has duly disallowed the claim so as to set the period of limitation running, subsequent correspondence between the parties in which the carrier neither agrees to pay nor recedes from the original position of disallowing the claim does not prevent the running of such period.[37] A letter from the carrier which is merely part of negotiations looking to a settlement is not, however, necessarily a disallowance which will start the running of such period.[38] Where the limitation runs from the day of disallowance, the view has been expressed that it is impossible for a claim for injury and loss to be disallowed before delivery to claimant.[39]

Under a stipulation that no suit shall be maintainable unless instituted within a specified time after happening of injuries, delay, or delays, it has been held that, in the case of damage to live stock, the period of limitation begins to run from the date of the delivery of live stock at destination.[40]

Failure of an express company which took over and actually operated the business of another company immediately to obtain a license to do business does not interrupt the running of the contractual period of limitation on a cause of action which had arisen against such other company where the first-mentioned company could have been served with process and sued at any time after taking over such business.[41]

b. Constitutional or Statutory Provisions

Stipulations in shipping contracts limiting the time within which suit may be brought may be rendered invalid and inoperative by constitutional or statutory provisions.

State constitutional or statutory provisions prohibiting stipulations in shipping contracts limiting the time to sue are given effect in so far as they are applicable.[42] A statutory provision that, if a person entitled to bring an action dies before the expiration of the time limited for the commencement thereof and the action survives, an action may be commenced after the expiration of that time and within one year from his death does not apply so as to extend the time for suit fixed by provision in a shipping contract,[43] nor does a statutory provision that a suit in renewal of one dismissed, but which has been brought in time, shall stand on the same footing as to limitation as the original suit.[44]

Offer of specified amount

Evidence showing numerous letters, none of which contained language of finality until letter written about two months before bringing of action for damage to goods in transit, justified verdict that carrier did not reject claim at any time prior to maximum period limited in bill of lading for bringing action, as against contention that railroad's letter offering eight hundred dollars by way of settlement of claim for one thousand one hundred and fifteen dollars for repairing goods pursuant to railroad's authorization constituted disallowance of claim within meaning of bill of lading.—Chappell v. Constitutional provision

(1) Const. art. 23, § 9, providing that any provisions of any contract or agreement, express or implied, stipulating for notice or demand otherwise than as may be provided by law, as a condition precedent to establish any claim, demand or liability, shall be null and void, construed as aimed at an attempt to abridge the time within which rights under the law may be enforced, prohibited a provision limiting the time in which to sue in a contract covering an intra-state shipment.—Missouri, K. & T. (2) The provision of Rev.L.1910 § 828 permitting the inclusion in a bill of lading of reasonable requirements as to notice and demand of damages did not permit the insertion of such provision for limitation.—Missouri, K. & T. Ry. Co. v. Williamson, supra.

the statutory period[46] were not prohibited by the Carmack amendment, Act of June 29, 1906, 34 U.S. St. at L. p 595, c 3591, § 7, 49 U S.C.A. § 20 par (11), which prohibits a common carrier from limiting by contract, rule, or regulation its liability for damages resulting from its own negligence or the negligence of any other common carrier into whose possession the property may come for transportation by virtue of the bill of lading which the statute requires the initial carrier to issue to the shipper; and inasmuch as the Carmack amendment supersedes state legislation on the subject, a limitation of the character under consideration in a contract for interstate shipment will be valid, notwithstanding any state legislation to the contrary.[47] So it has been held that a valid limitation in a shipping contract requiring suit to be brought within a designated time is not affected by another limitation of liability in the contract which is void because in violation of the Interstate Commerce Act.[48]

Even though no bill of lading was issued, where the shipper paid the reduced rate provided in the tariffs and classification filed with the interstate commerce commission for shipments subject to a uniform bill of lading containing a stipulation limiting the time to sue, such stipulation binds the shipper,[49] and it has also been held that, even though a bill of lading was issued which did not contain the limitation provision, the omission does not affect the liability of the parties where the rate charged corresponded to that for shipments subject to the limitation clause as fixed by tariffs filed with, and approved by, the interstate commerce commission.[50] There is authority for the view, however, that where there is a written contract covering the shipment, the carrier may not claim the benefit of a stipulation limiting the period for suit unless such stipulation is incorporated into the contract,[51]

Shipper not charged with notice

A bill of lading bearing on an adhesive slip the stamped words, "Section 3 is amended as per classification governing" did not charge a shipper with notice that the time for suing for delay in delivery was limited to two years and one day, § 3 of the conditions covering the shipment not referring to limitations.

even though a form of contract containing the stipulation has been filed with, and approved by, the interstate commerce commission.[52] It has been held that a stipulation which was not a part of the schedule filed by the carrier with the interstate commerce commission was not binding on the shipper, on the theory that such stipulation affected or tended to determine the rate.[53]

The fact that the carrier offered no alternative rate as a consideration for the inclusion in the shipping contract of a stipulation limiting the time for bringing suit does not render the stipulation inoperative where it conforms to the controlling statutory provision, since such stipulation is not a limitation of liability.[54] It has been held in respect of an interstate shipment, however, that, where a valid oral contract has previously been made a stipulation in a subsequent written contract that suit for damages must be brought within a specified time is not binding without some new consideration.[55] In the absence of any evidence showing that the rate charged was not authorized by the interstate commerce commission and, therefore, illegal, the right of claimant to avoid the effect of a stipulation limiting the time to sue on the ground that the rate was less than that authorized has been denied.[56]

The Cummins amendment, Act of March 4, 1915, 38 U.S.St. at L. p 1197 c 176, 49 U.S.C.A. § 20 par (11), which modified the Carmack amendment and directed that it shall be unlawful for common carriers subject to the statute to provide a shorter period for the institution of suits than two years, was amended or supplemented by the more definite provision of the Act of February 28, 1920, 41 U.S.St. at L. p 494, c 91, 49 U.S.C.A. § 20, par (11), that it shall be unlawful to provide a shorter period for the institution of suits than two years, such period to be computed from the day when notice in writing is given by the carrier to claimant that the carrier has disallowed the claim or any part or parts thereof specified in the notice,[57] which latter provision is still in force under the most recent amendment, Act of April 23, 1930, 46 U.S.St. at L. p 252 c 208, 49 U.S.C.A. § 20 par (11). Neither the foregoing provision of the Cummins amendment nor such later provision applied to a case which arose before its enactment.[58]

These statutory provisions which prescribe a minimum period of limitation which may be provided for by a shipping contract do not operate as a statute of limitations.[59] They permit, but do not require, the insertion of a provision as to limitation in the contract of shipment.[60] Furthermore, the carrier does not derive from such statutory provisions the right to provide by contract for a reasonable period of limitation;[61] as shown in the preceding subdivision of this section, such right does not depend on statutory authorization. The contract of shipment may properly provide for a period longer than the minimum prescribed in a statutory provision of this type,[62] but it may not provide for

(1) The provision of the Act of Febr. 28, 1920, that the two-year period shall be computed from the day notice in writing of disallowance is given did not apply to a shipment which was in transit when the statute was enacted so as to render inoperative a stipulation requiring suit to be brought within two years and one day after delivery or after a reasonable time for delivery.—Small v. Pittsburgh, C., C. & St. L. R. Co., 89 Pa.Super. 64.

(2) Such provision did not affect the rights of the parties which had been determined by expiration of the limitation period under bill of lading before that amendment was adopted, since it would raise a serious constitutional question to give the amendment that effect.—N. Pelaggi & Co. v. Central Vermont Ry. Co., 121 A. 441, 97 Vt. 1.

a shorter period.[63]

In the case of shipments made after the enactment of the provision of the Cummins amendment which was silent as to the time from which the period of limitation should run, and before the enactment of the amending or supplementing provision of the Act of February 28, 1920, the validity and binding effect of a stipulation of a bill of lading or other shipping contract that suit shall be instituted only within two years and one day after delivery of the property, or, in case of failure to deliver, within two years and one day after a reasonable time for delivery has elapsed was frequently recognized or upheld.[64] The later statutory provision, however, for computing the period of limitation from the day of disallowance of the claim renders invalid and ineffective a stipulation which restricts the institution of suits for loss, damage or delay, to two years and one day after the delivery of the property[65] and also a stipulation containing such attempted restriction and, in respect of failure to make delivery, the further provision, in the alternative, of two years and one day after a reasonable time for delivery has elapsed,[66] the court cannot give effect to the stipulation by reading into it such provision of the later statute as to the time from which the limitation is to run.[67] The validity and binding effect of certain other provisions for limitations in shipping contracts have, however,

Ruling of interstate commerce commission

(1) In a case in which the bill of lading provision set forth in the text was involved it was held that, where the interstate commerce commission in ruling, in December, 1919, that bills of lading limiting the time for bringing suit should allow six months after the rejection of the claim by the carrier, unless rejected more than six months before the expiration of the period of limitation, entered no order but simply provided that carriers would be expected to modify their bills of lading in accordance therewith and that further action might be taken if this was not done, the proposed change was prospective and did not affect a prior bill of lading under which the rights of the parties had become fixed.

Vt.—N Pelaggi & Co v. Central Vermont Ry. Co., 121 A. 441, 97 Vt. 1.

(2) There was a recognition of the legality of a contract containing a limitation in accordance with that set forth in the text, first prescribed by the interstate commerce commission in the uniform bill of lading, and of the fact that a period of two years was not necessarily unreasonable — Humphrey-Cornell Co. v. Hines, supra

Effect of unnecessary claim

Where, in a stipulation similar to the one set forth in the text, there was an added provision that no claims not in suit will be paid after the lapse of two years as above, unless made in writing within four months as above specified, the fact that a notice was given although not required did not render inoperative the stipulation limiting the time for bringing suit or extend the period for bringing suit —Hankins v. Setting off claim for damage against claim for freight

The claim of a shipper for damages, although under the terms of the bills of lading action thereon was barred by limitation, could be set off by a receiver for shipper against claims of the carrier for freight —First Nat Bank of Chicago v. Rogers, Brown & Co, D C Wash, 299 F. 602.

been recognized under such later statutory provision.[68] Where the contractual provision is in conformity with the statutory provision restricting the carrier's rights in this regard and is otherwise valid and binding, failure to bring the action within the time fixed by such contractual provision bars an action by claimant,[69] even though the time fixed is shorter than that fixed in the statute of limitations[70] and a statute of the state of the forum might prevent the operation of the contract provision if the shipment were not interstate.[71]

War-time federal control of carriers. The provision of the Act of February 28, 1920, 41 U S St. at L. p 462, c 91 § 206 f, that the period of federal control shall not be computed as a part of the periods of limitation in actions against carriers for causes of actions arising prior to federal control applies to limitations prescribed by state or federal statutes[72] and not to a stipulation in a shipping contract limiting the time within which suit must be brought.[73] There is also authority for the view that such statutory provision did not reach back

Bills of lading covering intrastate and interstate transportation

Where grain was transported within the state, without loss, to destination, and sold to purchaser, to whom indorsed shipper's order bill of lading was delivered, and who surrendered it for shipper's order bill of lading for transportation to another place outside the state over connecting lines, during which some grain was lost, and limitation on time for instituting suit, contained in carrier's tariff schedule on file with interstate commerce commission was inserted in second bill of lading, but not in first, liability for loss arose under second bill of lading, and failure to sue within time specified barred action by first shipper to recover from carrier issuing bill of lading.—Farmers' Grain Union v Davis, 240 P. 843, 119 Kan. 556.

and revive a right of action against the carrier where the full period for bringing the action as fixed by the shipping contract had expired before the enactment of such statutory provision.[74]

In view of the fact that the purpose of § 206 a of such Act which provided that actions may be brought against the agent designated by the president, arising out of federal control, and that such actions may be brought within the periods of limitation prescribed by state or federal statutes but not later than two years from the date of the passage of the act was to limit and not to extend rights of action[75] such provision did not invalidate prior valid contracts limiting the period for bringing suit,[76] and did not restore the right to sue to those who had lost such right because of noncompliance with such a valid contract.[77]

§ 243. Waiver of Limitation

As to interstate shipments, there is authority for the view that the carrier may not waive a stipulation limiting the time within which to sue. As to intra-state shipments, the right to waive is usually recognized.

Since the decision of the supreme court of the United States in Georgia, F. & A. Ry. Co. v. Blish Milling Co., Ga., 36 S.Ct. 541, 241 U.S. 190, 60 L. Ed. 948, which involved the waiver of a stipulation for making a written claim, considered above in § 241, it has frequently been held or recognized that the carrier may not, in case of an interstate shipment, waive a provision in a contract of shipment limiting the time within which suit for loss or injury must be brought[78] notwithstanding the alleged waiver occurs before the time limit has expired.[79] The view has been taken that such a waiver would constitute an invalid discrimination, as shown below in § 364. It has been held, however, that even in the case of an interstate shipment, the carrier is estopped to assert the contractual limitation where he has induced claimant to delay bringing suit beyond the period of limitation.[80] While in a case in the supreme court of the United States in which a stipulation limiting the time in which to sue was involved, the justice who announced the decision cited the Blish case with approval and expressed the view that the parties to a bill of lading cannot waive its terms, nor can the carrier by its conduct give the shipper a right to ignore them, it may be noted that only four of the nine sitting justices expressed concurrence in such view.[81]

In construing the above statutory provision in a case in which a contractual limitation was involved it was held that such statutory provision did not extend the time, as state or federal laws were to govern if they did not extend the time of bringing actions beyond two years from the passage of the act, and, if they did, then the act limited them to two years from its passage—Northern Milling Co. v. Division in court

Three other justices concurred in the opinion containing the view set forth in the text, rendered by Mr. Justice Brandeis in announcing the judgment of reversal, three justices dissented, and Mr. Justice McReynolds, with whom another justice concurred, concurred in the judgment for reversal but said: "The broad declaration that the parties to a bill of lading cannot waive its terms nor can the carrier, by its conduct, give the shipper the right to ignore them goes beyond what is necessary to the decision and I am not prepared to assent to it as a proposition of law"—Texas & P. Ry. Co. v Leatherwood, Tex., 39 S.Ct. 517, 518, 250 U.S. 478, 63 L.Ed. 1096.

Prior to the decision in the Blish Case, it was generally recognized, without making the distinction as to interstate shipments, that a limitation of time within which action shall be brought might be waived by any conduct of the carrier calculated to induce, and which has induced, the owner to delay the bringing of suit beyond the time stipulated.[82] In the absence of a contravening constitutional or statutory provision, a contractual limitation is still subject to waiver in respect of intra-state shipments[83]

The mere fact that the carrier indicates to claimant that time for an investigation is desired does not constitute a waiver where there is nothing in the negotiations from which claimant may reasonably assume that the carrier intends to settle the claim without suit.[84] The claimant may not rely on a letter from the carrier stating that the matter would be taken up with claimant after the receipt of definite information as a waiver of the stipulation fixing a limitation on the time to sue where such letter was received more than a year before the time to sue had expired.[85]

R. ACTIONS FOR LOSS OF, OR INJURY TO PROPERTY

§ 244. Nature and Form

Where goods are injured only, the owner's remedy against the carrier is for damages, and not for the value of the goods. For injury to an interstate shipment the owner may sue the carrier at common law for negligence, although there is contrary authority.

Where goods intrusted to a carrier for transportation and delivery are injured only, the owner's remedy is an action for damages, and not for the value of the goods.[86]

Interstate shipments. It has been held that the owner of property delivered to a carrier for interstate transportation has a right of action against the carrier at common law for negligence causing injury to the property, notwithstanding the federal statutes,[87] and that, although a shipper of live stock under a written contract for interstate shipment cannot avoid the effect of a provision in the contract requiring notice to the carrier of loss or damage to the stock in transit, as noted supra § 237, he may nevertheless sue in tort for such loss or damage.[88] On the other hand, it has been held that the common-law action for damages to an interstate shipment of live stock has been superseded by federal legislation and the rules of the interstate commerce commission.[89] Where the complaint charged negligent failure to deliver goods, and there was evidence of loss, raising a presumption of negligence, the action was in tort, based on negligence, although the issue submitted said nothing about negligence.[90]

Election of form. The right of a shipper to elect whether to sue the carrier in contract or tort for injury to, or loss of, property intrusted to it has been discussed in the C.J.S. title Actions § 49 c (4).

§ 245. Right of Action and Defenses

a. Right of action
b. Defenses

a. Right of Action

far as the right of action relates only to the question as to who is entitled to maintain the action, it is treated infra § 249 in connection with the discussion as to the proper parties plaintiff.

b. Defenses

Among the many defenses that have been interposed in actions against carriers for loss of, or injury to, property in their custody, some have been held good, and others insufficient, depending on the nature of the defense and the rules of law regulating the carrier's liability.

The defenses generally available to a carrier sued for loss of, or injury to, goods while in its possession, which, as already considered in §§ 75–79, are (1) an act of God, (2) the public enemy, (3) the act of the shipper, or (4) the inherent nature of the goods themselves, are affirmative defenses.[91]

A carrier cannot set up the congestion of traffic[92] and the consequent difficulties and interferences in procuring cars for shipment,[93] as an excuse for injury to goods in transit; nor can the carrier defend in action for loss of goods in transit on the ground of a nonfraudulent misstatement as to the contents of a package delivered to it for transportation, whereby a lower freight rate was charged than that fixed by the tariff.[94]

A carrier's failure to issue a bill of lading or receipt for an interstate shipment, as required by the federal statute, is no defense to an action against the carrier for the loss of, or injury to, the shipment,[95] nor is it a defense that plaintiff could not recover under a bill of lading held as collateral security.[96]

A shipper cannot recover from a carrier for damage to cattle sold after shipment under an option contract entered into before the shipment;[97] but the shipper's right of action is not affected by a sale of the cattle, when, on their arrival, the buyer refused, because of the damage to the cattle, to purchase them, although he did subsequently purchase them, but not under the option contract.[98]

The fact that the United States government has levied a fine against a carrier for the loss of registered mail while in the carrier's custody and control is no bar to an action of tort, to which the government is not a party, brought by the owner of the mail matter against the carrier to recover for the loss.[99]

Where the consignee of cotton damaged while in the carrier's possession paid a draft for the gin weight under a custom that compress weight on delivery, if different, governed, and that the difference would be adjusted, the mere fact that the adjustment had not been made at the time of the trial, did not relieve the carrier from liability.[1]

Where a shipper sues a carrier to recover the value of a substantial part of a shipment of freight which was lost or destroyed in transit, failure to pay the freight charges and demurrage does not defeat the right to recover, if plaintiff had offered to pay the freight, and remove his goods, during the free period, on condition that the agents of defendant should check up the lost and injured property with him.[2]

Diversion of shipment. The diversion of a shipment with the carriers' consent from its original destination to a better market is no defense to an action for damages to the goods.[3]

Rule or practice of carrier. The custom of a switching carrier operating between terminals to make no inspection and do no re-icing of cars containing perishable food products, although known to the consignee, is no defense to an action by the consignee for loss caused by failure properly to ice the car,[4] nor can a rule or regulation for the conduct of its business which the carrier habitually and systematically disregards be set up as a defense in an action for loss of goods accepted in contravention of such rule.[5]

§ 246. Jurisdiction and Venue

a. Jurisdiction

b. Venue

a. Jurisdiction

State courts have jurisdiction of actions for loss of, or injury to, an interstate shipment. Whether a state court has jurisdiction of such an action brought against a foreign carrier depends on the residence of the parties and the place where the cause of action arose.

State courts have jurisdiction of actions for loss of, or injury to, an interstate shipment,[8] and a shipper who has suffered damage through an interstate shipment by reason of a failure on the part of the carrier to perform duties imposed by a federal statute in the matter of caring for the shipment may bring suit therefor in a state court.[9]

Actions against foreign carriers. It has been held that a state court has no jurisdiction of an action against a foreign express company by a nonresident of the state to recover for injury to an interstate shipment, where the cause of action arose elsewhere, out of a transportation beginning and ending in other states and not passing through any point within the state,[10] and even, it has been held, though the shipment passed through the state to reach its destination;[11] and a like rule has been held in an action against a railroad carrier having a soliciting agent within the state.[12] A state court, however, has jurisdiction of an action by a resident of the state against a foreign express company doing business within the state for injury to goods shipped from a point without the state to a point within;[13] and the same rule has been applied even where the contract of carriage was made and performed in other states.[14] So it has been held that a foreign express company doing business in the District of Columbia through officers or agents fully authorized to represent the company there may be sued for injury to goods, the shipment of which began and was completed in distant states, and did not pass through the District.[15]

b. Venue

The venue of actions against carriers for loss of, or injury to, goods is governed by general or special statutes.

The question of venue in actions for loss of, or injury to, goods may be determined by an application of general laws; but, for the most part is a matter of special statutory regulation.[16]

6. Estoppel as defense

That a shipper of live stock, being present and fully aware of the extent and condition of the bedding then in the cars, accepted it as bedded, and so is estopped to claim improper bedding as cause of injury, is proper matter of defense in action for damages to the shipment.—Kansas City, M. & O Ry. Co of Texas v. Weatherby, Tex Civ App, 203 S W. 793.

7. Fraud

Carrier having granted shipper of ore special privilege of having car placed on siding en route for sampling of ore, in violation of law, should not be permitted to defend, in shipper's action for loss of ore by theft, on ground that the separation of metallics from other ore constituted fraud, so as to release carrier from liability.—Siebert v. Erie R Co, 179 N.Y S. 136, 189 App Div. 586

Refusal of consignee to receive goods

In action against carrier for damages to goods, wherein plaintiff recovered as damages the difference between their value in their damaged condition and their value had they not been damaged, his recovery will not be denied because of his refusal to receive them, when such refusal in no way increased carrier's liability—Whittington v. 16. In Georgia

(1) Civ Code 1895 § 2334, fixing the venue of suits against railroad companies, is as follows: "All railroad companies shall be sued in the county in which the cause of action originated, by any one whose . . . property has been injured by such railroad company . . . for the purpose of recovering damages for such injuries; and also on all contracts made or to be performed in the county where suit is brought, any judgment rendered in any other county than the one in which the cause so originated shall be utterly void. But if the cause of action arises in a county where the railroad company liable to suit has no agent, then suit may be brought in the county of the residence of such company." The venue of all cases not falling within the provisions of this section is governed by the general law—Lytle v. Southern R. Co, 59 S E 595, 3 Ga App. 219

(2) Foreign corporations are within the purview of this section as to contracts made and torts committed in the state—Hazlehurst v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co., 45 S E 703, 118 Ga. 858—10 C J. p 345 note 41

(3) But the statute does not cover the case of a tort committed in another state by a nonresident corporation—Reeves v. Southern R. Co, 49 S E. 674, 121 Ga. 561, 70 L.R.A. 513, 2 Ann.Cas 207—10 C.J p 345 note 42.

(4) In such case an action of tort may be brought in any county in the state in which legal service of process can be made.—Lytle v. Southern R. Co, supra.

(5) By the express provisions of the statute a judgment against a

§ 247. Conditions Precedent

A demand is not a prerequisite to an action of contract against a carrier for loss or destruction of goods; nor is payment of the freight charges a condition precedent to an action by the consignor for damages to the goods which the carrier accepted without demanding prepayment of such charges.

No demand is necessary before commencing an action of contract against a carrier for neglecting to carry and to deliver the goods according to the contract, if the goods are lost or destroyed;[17] but, as stated supra § 234, where the contract of shipment contains a reasonable requirement of giving notice of loss of, or injury to, the goods, the giving of such notice is a condition precedent to the action for loss or injury. Where the carrier has accepted goods for transportation without demanding prepayment of freight, payment of freight by the consignor of whom the carrier has not demanded payment thereof is not a condition precedent to a suit by the consignor for loss of, or injury to, the goods shipped.[18]

§ 248. Time to Sue, and Limitations

Actions against carriers for the loss of, or injury to, goods must be brought within the time prescribed by special statutes limiting the time for bringing such actions.

Under the United States Code, 49 U.S.C.A § 20 par 11, as amended March 4, 1927, an action for railroad company on a suit for damages resulting from an injury to property, rendered in any other county than the one in which the cause of action originated, is "utterly void," except in cases where the suit is brought in the county where the principal office of the company is located, and where it is shown that the company had no agent in the county where the cause of action originated—Southern R. Co. v. Brock, 42 S.E. 65, 115 Ga. 721.

(6) An action for injury to a shipment, based on the contract of affreightment, may be brought either in the county in which the contract was entered into or in the county where the carrier undertook to render full performance by delivery of the shipment in good order to the person entitled to receive it.—Friedman v. Seaboard Air-Line R. Co., 52 S.E. 763, 124 Ga. 472.

(7) An action for loss of the goods based on the contract may be brought in the county where the contract was executed.—Albany, etc., R Co v. Merchants', etc., Bank, 73 S E 637, 137 Ga. 391—10 C J. p 346 note 46.

(8) By virtue of another statute, Civ Code 1895 § 2004, every express company doing business in the state is subject to suit for failure to perform its duties as a carrier, either in the county where the goods are received for shipment or in the county where the delivery of the goods is directed to be made; and this is true notwithstanding provision is made in a special charter granted to a particular company that it shall be liable to suit in any county wherein it may tortiously injure the person or property of another, or where any contract to which it is a party may be made or is to be performed. —Southern Express Co v. B. R. Electric Co, 55 S E 254, 126 Ga. 472.

In Kentucky

(1) Civ Code § 73 provides that an action against a common carrier on a contract to carry property must be brought in the county in which defendant or either of several defendants resides, or in which the contract is made, or in which the carrier agrees to deliver the property, and under such provision it has been held that an action on a contract of shipment for loss of, or injury to, the goods shipped may be brought in the county in which the contract was made, or in which defendant resides, or where the goods were to be delivered—Wilson v. Louisville, etc, R Co., 112 S W. 585, 33 Ky L 985—Plotz v. Miller, 51 S W. 176, 21 Ky L. 257—Nashville, etc., R. Co. v. Carrico, 14 Ky.L 431.

(2) On the other hand, suit cannot be brought for loss or injury on the contract of shipment in a county which was neither the residence of defendant, the place where the contract was made, nor the place where the goods were to be delivered—Jewell v. Louisville, etc., R. Co, 140 S W. 689, 145 Ky. 493.

(3) Under Civ Code § 73, the provisions of which have already been set out, and § 92, providing that a special demurrer is an objection to a pleading which shows that the court has no jurisdiction of defendant, etc, a demurrer to the petition in such an action for want of jurisdiction of the cause of action is bad, where the petition does not show that the county where the action is brought is not the county where the contract was made nor where defendant resides, and the objection of want of jurisdiction over defendant, not being raised by answer, is waived—Richardson v. Louisville, etc, R. Co, 111 S W. 343, 129 Ky 449, 33 Ky L 916, rehearing denied 112 S.W. 582, 129 Ky. 449, 33 Ky L. 972

(4) A carrier "resides" in the county where its chief officer or agent and place of business are when the action is commenced—Knight v Pennsylvania R. Co., 94 S W.2d 1013, 264 Ky 412.

In Louisiana a statute authorizing actions against carriers for failure to deliver a shipment to be brought, at plaintiff's option, either in the parish where the goods were to be delivered, or at the domicile of the carrier, was amended so as also to permit such actions to be brought at the place of shipment, and it was held that such amendment was valid and was applicable to a pending action in which a plea to the jurisdiction had been filed, but not tried, when the amendment was passed—Bass v. Yazoo & M. V. R Co., 65 So. 355, 136 La 528.

In Virginia

(1) Under a statute providing that an action may be brought in any county or corporation where the cause of action or any part thereof arose, although none of defendants resides therein, a cause of action by a carrier's failure to deliver a shipment in good condition at the point of destination arises at the point of destination—Norfolk, etc, R. Co. v Crull, 70 S E 521, 112 Va. 151—Chesapeake, etc, R. Co v. American Exch. Bank, 23 S E 935, 92 Va. 495, 44 L R A 449

(2) An action for the value of produce rendered worthless by delay in making delivery lies in the county in which the produce was delivered to, and accepted by, the carrier for transportation, even though the contract was made in another county, since the contract was not complete until such delivery to, and acceptance by, the carrier.—Reed & Rice Co v. Wood, 120 S E 874, 138 Va. 187.

loss of, or injury to, an interstate shipment was requested to be brought within three years from the time the cause of action accrued, and this limitation has been held applicable to an action brought after the amendment of paragraph 11 by Act April 23, 1930, which omitted the clause relating to limitations.[19] The term "date of shipment," as used in a state statute relating to prescription in actions against carriers for loss of, or damage to, goods, is the date when the goods were delivered to the carrier and a bill of lading issued by it.[20] As to the applicability of general statutes of limitations, questions as to what statute applies to actions based on breach of the carrier's contract, resulting in the loss of the goods, are discussed in the C.J.S. title Limitation of Actions § 48, also 37 C.J. p 749 note 21. The question as to the time of accrual of the cause of action, for the purpose of computing the period of limitations, is discussed in the C.J.S. title Limitation of Actions § 143, also 37 C.J. p 841 notes 40-45.

§ 249. Parties Plaintiff

o. Joinder of parties plaintiff

a. Owner in General

The owner of the goods is the proper party plaintiff in an action of tort to recover for their loss or injury. If the action is for breach of contract, the owner may sue if the contract was made with him or for his benefit.

The right to recover for loss of goods shipped depends entirely on the title to the goods.[21] The owner of the goods is entitled to maintain an action of tort against the carrier for loss of, or injury to, the goods, although he is not the party with whom the contract of shipment was made;[22] and such tort action should be brought by the owner and by him only, whether he be the consignor, consignee, or a third person,[23] although, as shown infra § 249 k, he need not be the absolute owner, but may have merely a special interest. Where a seller, who is both consignor and consignee, indorses the bill of lading, the real purchaser, having paid a draft on the ostensible purchaser and received the goods, may sue the carrier for their injury.[24] If the action is for breach of contract the owner may sue if he is the party with whom or for whose benefit the contract was made.[25] Thus, if the contract is made by an agent, the action may be brought by the owner.[26] While the effect of a consignment of goods generally is to vest the property in the consignee, so that he may sue for loss or injury, as stated infra subdivision d of this section, yet, if the bill of lading is special to deliver the goods to A for the use of B, the property vests in B, and the action must be brought in his name in case of loss or damage.[27] An assignment by the shipper of his account against the consignee is not an assignment of the goods shipped under a straight bill of lading, so as to permit the assignee, who had no title to the goods, to sue the carrier for loss.[28]

Purchaser of goods in transit. A person who purchases a carload shipment in transit, without inspection, or actual or constructive knowledge of injury thereto while in the carrier's possession, and assuming payment of the freight charges, may recover from the carrier for the injury,[29] but, when the goods are inspected by the purchaser, or are displayed for inspection, he takes them in the condition in which they are offered for sale, without redress against the carrier for prior damage thereto.[30] However, if the goods should suffer further injury at the hands of the carrier for which it would be responsible, whether in transit, awaiting delivery, or while being transported after reconsignment, the purchaser would have a cause of action against the carrier for the additional damage.[31]

b. Consignor as Owner

A consignor who has title to the property shipped is entitled to sue the carrier for loss thereof, or injury thereto.

Where the consignor has parted with his title to, and ownership of, the goods, he cannot maintain an action against the carrier for injury thereto,[32] unless there has been an assignment to him of the consignee's right to recover from the carrier.[33]

But, in the absence of statutory provisions to the contrary,[34] where title to the goods shipped remains in the consignor,[35] or has revested in him subsequent to the shipment of the goods,[36] he is entitled to sue for loss thereof, or injury thereto, since he is the person who has sustained the loss or injury,[37] and the fact that he has not secured by assignment the consignee's rights is immaterial.[38] This rule has been applied in cases where the goods are not to become the property of the consignee until delivery,[39] where title does not pass because the contract of sale of the goods shipped is bad for noncompliance with the statute of frauds,[40] where the contract of sale of the goods shipped is rescinded by agreement of the parties;[41] where the consignee refuses to receive the goods and they are thrown back on the consignor;[42] where the consignor ships

Where goods are shipped on open bills of lading, so that title passes, but the price of the goods to the consignee is docked the amount of any loss or damage, the adjustment amounts to an equitable assignment to the consignor of the consignee's right to recover of the carrier.—Produce Trading Co v. Acts constituting rescission

Refusal of the consignee of a dressed hog to accept it because in bad and unusable condition, and the act of the consignor in bringing an action against the carrier for negligence in handling, constitutes a rescission of the contract and a restoration of title to the consignor, so as to entitle him to sue notwithstanding the general rule that a common carrier on open bill of lading is an agent of the consignee.—Anderson v. 10 C.J. p. 348 note 75.

Acts not constituting acceptance

Where goods had been injured in transit, that consignee inspected goods at destination did not constitute acceptance making good delivery placing title in consignee, so as to require it to sue for their damage.—Ithaca Roller Mills v. Ann Arbor R. Co., 163 N.W. 934, 197 Mich. 440 goods to be sold by the consignee for his benefit;[43] where goods are shipped to a customer to be tested by him and purchased if satisfactory,[44] where a shipment is made to the consignee who has not agreed to accept the same unless the goods are up to a certain grade;[45] or where a contract of sale allows a purchaser and a consignee to refuse the goods if not in good condition on arrival.[46]

So it has been held that, in a suit by the consignor against the carrier to recover the loss caused by damage to the goods shipped, where no exception has been filed in limine to the right of such consignor to sue, and where the consignee appears and testifies for plaintiff on the merits, the defense by the carrier that the consignor, not being the owner of the goods, has no cause of action cannot avail it, since the only object of the carrier in seeking to have the proper plaintiff is to avoid double payment for the damage claimed;[47] and the action of the consignee in testifying for plaintiff consignor is tantamount to an acquiescence by the consignee, and he is thereby estopped from recovering on the same cause of action.[48]

Although the statutes of another state make it illegal for any unlicensed person to ship fish caught in the waters of that state, and also make it illegal for any carrier to receive from such person a shipment of fish, an unlicensed person who ships fish in violation of the statute may nevertheless sue the carrier for the loss of the shipment, plaintiff not requiring the aid of an illegal transaction to make out his case.[49]

c. Consignor as Contracting Party

(1) Actions ex contractu
(2) Actions ex delicto

(1) Actions ex Contractu

By the weight of authority a consignor who makes an express or implied contract for the transportation of property is entitled to sue thereon for loss of, or injury to, the property, irrespective of ownership, but the action will inure to the benefit of the consignee or real owner.

As elsewhere shown, infra subdivision e of this section, there are a considerable number of decisions which hold that a consignor who has no title or interest in the goods shipped is not entitled to sue for loss of, or injury to, the goods, although he has made the contract of shipment. The decided weight of authority, however, is opposed to this view, and the better doctrine is that, where the consignor makes the contract of shipment with the carrier, he may maintain an action thereon for loss of, or injury to, the consignment, irrespective of the question of ownership, in such case it being considered that the privity of contract between the consignor and the carrier is a sufficient foundation on which to base the action,[50] and the fact that the consignor has sold the goods and has indorsed and delivered the bill of lading does not affect his right to sue.[51] This principle applies with equal force whether there is an express contract of shipment between the carrier and the consignor, or whether the contract is merely implied.[52] So the consignor may recover under the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended by the Carmack amendment, although he holds no bill of lading.[53] It has been held that the consignor's right of action on the contract is not affected by statutory provisions requiring every action to be brought in the name of the real party in interest;[54] but there are cases to the contrary.[55]

Action inures to benefit of owner or consignee. If the consignor has no interest in the goods, and his right of action is based solely on privity of contract, an action by him for failure to carry and to deliver safely to the consignee will inure to the benefit of the consignee or real owner; in such case the consignor is considered the trustee of an express trust.[56]

(2) Actions ex Delicto

The consignor cannot sue ex delicto for loss or injury where he has no interest in the property, although he made the contract of shipment and has the right of stoppage in transitu.

Where the consignor, although he has made the contract of shipment, has no general or special interest in the property, he cannot maintain an action in tort for loss or injury to the property;[57] and this is so, although he may have the right of stoppage in transitu;[58] but the consignor may bring suit in the name of the consignee with the latter's consent;[59] and the same rule applies where the consignor ships the goods to his own order, with directions to notify the buyer.[60]

d. Consignee in General

The consignee is presumptively the owner of the goods shipped and as such is entitled to sue for their loss or injury, although such presumption may be rebutted.

In so far as affects the question of who may sue for the loss of, or injury to, goods transported by a carrier, the presumption is that title to the goods passed to the consignee,[61] named in an open bill of lading,[62] and he is considered the person prima facie entitled to sue for loss or injury to goods shipped,[63] although the contract of affreightment was made with the consignor.[64] Nevertheless the presumption that the consignee is the owner of the goods is not conclusive and may be rebutted,[65] and, if the presumption is overcome, the action may properly be brought in the name of the consignor.[66]

Effect of special agreement. Even though there is a special agreement between the consignor and the consignee that the latter shall not become the absolute owner until the merchandise is inspected at the place of destination, the consignee may nevertheless sue for failure to deliver, if he holds bills of lading therefor and has paid drafts for the cost.[67] Where the consignor makes a special contract varying the carriers' common-law liability, a consignee who has title to the goods may sue for injury thereto, but his rights will be limited by such special contract.[68] On the other hand, it has been held that the consignee cannot sue upon a special contract of shipment made with the consignor.[69]

Where drafts drawn on general account. It has been held, however, that if the drafts paid are drawn on a general account, and not on any specific consignment, the consignee has no such interest as will entitle him to sue.[70]

Sale of damaged goods by consignee. Since a cause of action for damage to perishable goods in transit arises when the damage occurred, a consignee who sold the goods as damaged shipments, and not the purchaser at such sale, is the proper person to sue the carrier for the damage sustained.[71]

e. Consignee as Actual Owner

Where the consignee is the actual owner of the goods he may sue for loss of or injury thereto, and some authorities hold that he is the sole party entitled to sue, although the contract was made with the consignor.

Where the consignee is the actual owner of the goods he may, of course, maintain an action against the carrier for their loss or injury,[72] whether or not he has paid for the goods.[73] So, when the consignor releases all claim to goods lost in transit, the consignee is the proper party to sue for the loss.[74] Likewise, if the seller of goods, after delivery thereof to the carrier, sued the consignee buyer for the price, he abandoned any title to the goods which he might have, and the buyer had sufficient title to maintain an action against the carrier for loss of the goods.[75] Although as stated supra subdivision c of this section, the weight of authority is to the effect that the shipper, who makes the contract of shipment, is entitled to sue thereon for loss of injury to the goods, irrespective of the question of ownership, there are nevertheless some cases in which the right of the shipper to sue by virtue of the contract is ignored, and the consignee is held the only party entitled to sue, where the entire property in the consignment is vested in him.[76] Here even the consignor's right of stoppage in transit is not considered as affecting the question of parties, and the consignor, in making the contract of affreightment, is deemed merely an agent of the consignee, although the latter may be a stranger to the carrier.[77] Where the legal title to the goods was in the consignee, but the bill of lading was transferred to a purchaser after payment of the attached draft, and the damage to the goods occurred before such payment, an action for the damage was properly maintained in the name of the consignee for the use and benefit of the purchaser.[78]

f. Consignee Making Advances

A consignee making advances on the shipment has a lien or interest entitling him to sue for loss or injury thereto.

A consignee who has made advances on the consignment has a lien or property interest thereon, so as to entitle him to maintain an action against the carrier for loss of or injury thereto.[79]

g. Consignee Directing Mode of Shipment

A consignee who orders goods from the consignor, with directions to ship them over a particular route or by a particular mode of conveyance, may sue for loss or injury, unless it appears that the parties did not intend title to pass by delivery of the goods to the carrier.

Where a consignee orders goods of the consignor, to be forwarded over a designated route or by a particular mode of conveyance, the title passes to him on delivery to the carrier, and he is entitled to sue for loss of, or injury to, the goods,[80] and the same rule has been held applicable even where the consignee ordering goods names no particular carrier.[81] This rule, however, has no application, if it is apparent that the parties did not intend to pass title to the property by delivery to the carrier.[82]

h. Consignor as Agent of Consignee

The right to sue for loss of, or injury to, a shipment by the consignor acting merely as agent of the consignee is in the consignee.

If the consignor is the mere agent of the consignee in delivering the goods for transportation, the right of action for loss or injury is of course in the consignee.[83]

i. Consignee without Special or General Property

A consignee who has no special or general property in the goods, and incurs no risk in their transportation, cannot sue the carrier for their loss or injury.

Where a consignee has no special or general property in goods consigned to him and incurs no risk in their transportation, he cannot maintain an action against the carrier for loss or injury to the goods;[84] and the fact that such consignee purchases the goods or pays the draft attached to the bill of lading subsequently to the injury thereof does not act retroactively so as to give him a right of action.[85]

j. Shipper Both Consignor and Consignee

Where the shipper is both consignor and consignee he will be presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, to have sufficient title to sue the carrier for loss of, or injury to, the consignment.

Where a shipper makes a contract for the transportation of goods in his control, designating himself as consignee, it will be presumed that he has sufficient title to maintain an action against the carrier for loss of, or injury to, the goods during transit,[86] and the rule applies where goods are shipped to the order of the consignor and seller, with directions to notify the buyer.[87] The shipper is not, in such case, precluded from recovery because, before shipment, he had executed an assignment of the goods as security for an indebtedness not yet paid;[88] but the above presumption is rebuttable.[89]

k. Persons Having Special or Beneficial Interest

One who has a special property in the goods shipped, or a beneficial interest in the performance of the contract, such as a broker, factor, or bailee, may sue the carrier to recover for loss of, or injury to the goods, although the general owner may also sue.

One who has a special property or interest in the goods shipped, or a beneficial interest in the performance of the contract, is entitled to maintain an action for their loss or injury.[90]

A bailee has such special property in the goods as entitles him to maintain an action for loss of or injury thereto.[91]

If the consignee has a special property in the goods as factor or broker, he has such an interest in the shipment as will entitle him to maintain an action for loss of or injury thereto.[92] It is not necessary to his capacity as a plaintiff that he is entitled to all the damage, although he may recover the full damage done;[93] the judgment would bar another action by the real owner, and the owner's share would be held by the consignee to be accounted for by him.[94]

An agent who consigns goods to his principal has a sufficient interest to maintain an action for their loss or injury.[95]

General or special owner. The right of one having a special or beneficial interest in the goods shipped to maintain the action, as stated above, does not preclude an action by the general owner. Either one may sue,[96] and whichever first obtains damages it is a full satisfaction.[97]

Injury to dead body. Where a dead body is injured in transit, the next of kin may sue for such injury, although the contract of carriage was made by another.[98]

1. Holder of Bill of Lading

Where a bill of lading has been issued by the carrier, the holder of the bill of lading may, and usually must, sue for loss of, or injury to, a shipment. At common law the transferee of a bill of lading cannot sue in his own name on the contract, but under some statutes he may maintain such action.

Any lawful holder of a bill of lading issued by the initial carrier pursuant to the Carmack amendment or a state statute enacted in conformity therewith, may maintain an action for loss of, or damage or injury to, the property;[99] and ordinarily the holder of the bill must bring such action.[1] However, where no bill of lading is given, the shipper himself stands in the same position as if he were the lawful holder thereof, and the liability of the carrier to him is the same liability as is imposed in favor of the lawful holder of a receipt or bill of lading.[2] So it has been held that, notwithstanding the provision of the Carmack amendment that the carrier

Consignors as holders of bill

Consignors depositing bill of lading, issued to them to order of consignee, for collection by bank, which presented it to consignee with draft, which was not honored, whereupon bill was returned to bank, were holders of bill entitled under Carmack Amendment, U.S.Comp.St.1916 §§ 8604a, 8604aa, to claim for loss of goods delivered without surrender of bill as stipulated therein.—Babbitt v. Grand Trunk Western Ry. Co., 120 N.E. 803, 285 Ill. 267, affirming 209 Ill.App. 183.

Construction of statute

The word "lawful holder," as used in Carmack Amendment of June 29, 1906 § 7 pars 11 and 12, to Act Febr. 4, 1887 § 20, was held not to mean alone owner of shipment or his authorized agent with power to act so as to render judgment in action against carrier res judicata, although by § 8 of the earlier act carrier is made liable to person or persons injured.—Pennsylvania R. shall be liable to the lawful holder of the bill of lading, a shipper, or one who has succeeded to his rights, may sue the carrier for loss of, or injury to the goods shipped, even though he does not hold a bill of lading.[3] It has been held that, since a bill of lading is not an instrument for "the payment of money" within a statute requiring actions on such instruments to be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, an action ex contractu on a bill of lading for the loss of the goods cannot be maintained by the owner of the goods who is not in possession of the bill, but should be brought in the name of the consignor for the use of such owner.[4] On the other hand, it has been held that the person beneficially interested, although not in possession of the bill of lading for an interstate shipment, may recover for loss of, or injury to, the goods shipped.[5]

Indorsee or assignee of bill. Bills of lading stand in the place of the goods which they represent, and delivery or indorsement of them transfers the right of property in the goods, but not in the contract itself, as stated supra § 128, and the transferee cannot, therefore, maintain at common law an action in his own name on the contract,[6] but must sue in the name of the assignor for the latter's use.[7] However, in some jurisdictions bills of lading are negotiable by express enactment, as stated supra § 128, and assignees or indorsees thereof may bring action on them for loss or injury,[8] whether the loss or injury occurred before or after the bill of lading was transferred;[9] and it has also been held that such action is authorized by code provisions enabling the real party in interest to sue in his own name on any contract which has been transferred to him.[10] The indorsee or assignee, however, acquires no other or greater rights than the assignor had, since by the transfer only such title as the transferor had at the time passes.[11] The transferee of an "order notify" bill of lading who, after paying the draft attached, obtains possession of the bill, thereby acquiring legal title to the goods mentioned therein, may sue the carrier for any shortage in the shipment occurring after such transfer of title, and before delivery to him, where the shortage is traced to the carrier.[12] So it has been held that where a bill of lading is transferred by delivery, with intent to pass the title, the transferee has a right of action for damage to the goods in transit.[13]

m. Person to Be Notified

An action cannot be maintained against a carrier for loss of goods by one whose only interest is that he was mentioned in the bill of lading as the person to be notified of the arrival of the goods.

One who is mentioned in the bill of lading as the person to be notified on arrival of the goods has no such interest as will authorize him to maintain an action for loss of the goods shipped, in the absence of any evidence that he was either shipper or consignee,[14] or has title to the property.[15] So, where

Person beneficially interested

Under Carmack amendment, person beneficially interested is entitled to recover for loss or injury, although not having the bill of lading in his possession.—Norfolk Southern R. Co. v. Norfolk Truckers' Exchange, 88 S.E. 318, 118 Va. 650.

"We construe the statute to extend its remedy directly against the carrier to whom goods are delivered for shipment, and in behalf of the shipper who delivered the same for shipment, or in behalf of one who, by some lawful transaction, has succeeded to the shipper's rights. Such a person may or may not hold the bill of lading, and his failure to hold a bill of lading, upon proof of his right otherwise to recover, will no more defeat that right than will the mere possession of a bill of lading confer a right of recovery upon one otherwise without a right to recover In fact goods may be and frequently are delivered and received for shipment without a bill of lading being issued therefor. Certainly, if a bill of lading was never issued to a shipper, the carrier's failure to evidence its contract in this form would neither withdraw from the shipper his right to recover, nor relieve the carrier from its liability to pay for loss of goods delivered and received for shipment, under the right conferred and the liability fixed by the statute."—Bowden v. goods are shipped under a bill of lading to the seller, with directions to notify the buyer, and deliver to him on payment of the attached draft, delivery of the goods to the buyer upon payment of the draft did not give the buyer a right of action to recover for injury occurring prior to such payment.[16] On the other hand, it has been held that, where goods are consigned to the shipper's "order notify" the buyer, and the buyer pays the drafts attached to the bill of lading, the latter may sue for loss of the goods, although such loss occurred before the buyer paid the drafts.[17]

n. Assignees

The assignee of a claim for loss of, or injury to, goods shipped may sue on such claim in his own name.

Under the rule announced in the C.J.S. title Assignments § 125 permitting an assignee to sue in his own name, where the consignee assigns to the consignor his claim for loss of, or injury to, goods shipped, the latter may maintain an action therefor,[18] and where the consignor assigns his right to damages, the assignee may bring suit therefor.[19] On the other hand, where a cause of action for a tort cannot be assigned, an assignment, after loss of the property, by a consignee of all his rights on account of the tort to the consignor will not invest the consignor with title to the goods so as to enable him to maintain an action for the loss.[20]

o. Joinder of Parties Plaintiff

The general rules relating to joinder of parties plaintiff are applicable to actions against carriers for loss of, or injury to, goods while being transported.

If one of two or more joint owners or partners makes the contracts of shipment, he may sue alone for loss or injury.[21] Nevertheless, all joint owners may join in an action for loss of, or injury to, the consignment,[22] although the contract of shipment was made out in the names of two of them, the joint ownership of the other plaintiff or plaintiffs being unknown to the carrier.[23] Where an agent ships, in his own name under one bill of lading, goods belonging to different persons, acting as the agent of each separately, and not as the agent of the owners jointly, each owner can maintain his separate action for the damages sustained by him.[24]

Consignment to one of two owners. Where goods are consigned to one of two joint owners, the one to whom the consignment was made has been held entitled to sue alone for loss or injury thereto.[25] On the other hand, it has been held that both owners must join.[26]

§ 250. Parties Defendant

Employers of a servant who was not authorized to receive goods for transportation cannot be sued for the loss of, or injury to, the goods where they were not entitled to a share of the profits.

If property is intrusted for transportation to a servant not authorized to receive it by the ordinary business of his employers, and they are not entitled

a. Statement of Cause of Action in General

In an action against a carrier for loss of, or injury to property, plaintiff must allege facts constituting a good cause of action, and the fact that defendant is a common carrier must be alleged, or facts stated from which the law will infer such capacity, unless defendant is sued on a special contract of shipment. The usual rules relating to the construction of pleadings apply. If the form of complaint is prescribed by statute, it is sufficient to follow the statutory form.

The plaintiff's initial pleading in an action against a carrier for loss of, or injury to property shipped must allege, definitely and clearly,[29] facts constituting a good cause of action;[30] and, if the liability of defendant exists only by virtue of a statute, the complaint must allege facts constituting such liability.[31] In an action for injury to live stock, based on the carrier's common-law liability for failure to receive and transport the stock with reasonable care and diligence, where plaintiff alleged that several trains passed the carrier's pens in which the stock was awaiting shipment, but refused to take up such stock, it was not necessary for the petition to specify what time the trains arrived or to describe such trains in detail.[32] Where plaintiff sues for damage to a shipment, special notice of facts necessarily disclosed by inspection when the shipment was

Relevancy and materiality

(1) In action against railroad for damage to asparagus shipment caused by failure of lessee to furnish proper refrigeration equipment, allegations of petition relative to customary furnishing of suitable refrigerator cars to plaintiff for two years and familiarity of carrier with refrigerating requirements were held not subject to special demurrer as irrelevant and immaterial.—Southwestern R. Co. v. Davies, 186 S.E. 899, 53 Ga.App. 712.

(2) But allegations as to what lessee did with reference to refrigerating equipment after time of shipment in question were held demurrable as irrelevant.—Southwestern R. Co. v. Davies, supra.

Fraud

In an action in a case against a common carrier for negligently billing a tank car consigned to plaintiff as containing gasoline, when in fact it contained kerosene, in consequence of which plaintiff innocently pumped the contents of the car into his gasoline tank, thereby totally destroying the gasoline in his tank as well as the kerosene in the car, it is not essential to aver in the declaration that the carrier fraudulently billed the car as containing gasoline, and fraudulently represented it to be such on delivery.—Ohio-West Virginia Co. v. received need not be alleged.[33]

That defendant is a common carrier must be expressly alleged,[34] or facts must be stated from which the law will infer such capacity,[35] unless defendant is sued on a special contract of shipment, and not as a common carrier.[36]

Construction of pleadings. The general rules laid down in the C.J.S. title Pleading § 53, also 49 C.J. p 105 notes 11–16, p 117 note 91–p 119 note 6, are applicable in actions against carriers for loss of, or injury to, property, in construing the allegations of the petition or complaint and determining the nature and theory of the action.[37]

Statutory form of complaint. Where the form of the complaint in actions against carriers is prescribed by statute, it is sufficient for the pleading to follow the statutory form.[38]

Special exception to the petition as seeking to enforce a contract alleged as violating federal laws relating to rates on interstate shipments, need not name the particular laws.[39]

b. Right to Sue

Plaintiff must show that he has a general or special ownership in the property, or that the contract of shipment was made with him.

It must appear from the petition or complaint that plaintiff has a right to bring the action[40] as general or special owner of the property lost or injured,[41] or that he is the party with whom the contract of shipment was made;[42] but a petition alleging facts

Common-law liability

(1) A petition to recover for injury to an interstate shipment of live stock, charging that the stock was delivered to the carrier in good condition and that, when received by the consignee, some of the stock was dead or injured, is based on the carrier's common-law liability.—Dillen v. Wabash Ry. Co., Mo.App., 294 S.W. 439—Griggs v. St. Louis & H. R. Co., Mo.App., 285 S.W. 159.

(2) Where shipper of cattle suing carrier for damages in transit alleged carrier received cattle for shipment, received reward in payment for services, and caused damage by its negligence, there was sufficient allegation of common-law liability of carrier.—International & G. N. Ry. Co. v. Reed, Tex.Civ.App., 203 S.W. 410.

(3) But it was held that a petition for death of hogs in transit alleging fourteen hours was a reasonable time for transportation, but that defendant negligently handled the car while transporting the hogs and did not transport them in fourteen hours, and that, by reason of the negligent handling of the hogs, and the failure to deliver them in a reasonable time, certain of them died, was based on negligence both in the handling of the car and in delay, and not on the carrier's common-law liability—Cloyd v. Wabash Ry. Co., Mo.App., 240 S.W. 885.

Negligence or contract

In action for damages for injury to a shipment of sheep, plaintiff's right to recover under the complaint was held not based on an alleged oral contract with defendant's dispatcher for speedy unloading but on negligence of defendant in performing the obligation of a common carrier.—Smith v. Hines, 196 P. 1032, 33 Idaho 582

Negligence or conversion

Allegations in shipper's complaint were held not to show conversion of milk by carrier, but to set forth action of tort for negligence causing loss during transportation—Oakdale Farms v. Rutland R. Co., 158 A. 678, 104 Vt. 279.

Theft by carrier's employees

Petition of plaintiff seeking to recover for loss of shipment of tin was held to charge theft by employees of carrier acting in their own interests and against the interest of the carrier.—Moore v. Duncan, Ohio, 237 F. 780, 150 C.C.A. 534

Double damages

Plaintiff, suing railroad for damages to cattle in delayed shipment for loss because of treatment given cattle, and because market dropped before their arrival at destination, but after they should have arrived, did not sue for double damages, and the allegations are not subject to such construction.—Panhandle & S. Pleading insufficient

In action ex contractu on bill of lading for loss of goods, count alleging damages for failure to deliver certain described goods consigned to another, and that plaintiff was owner of goods, was subject to demurrer, as it failed to show any right of action in plaintiff, but showed that right was in consignor, no assignment of it to plaintiff being alleged nor suit brought in name of consignor for use of plaintiff as owner, as it should have been.—Alabama Great Southern R. Co. v. Lawler, 104 So. 412, 213 Ala. 119.

from which plaintiff's ownership may be inferred is sufficient as against a general demurrer.[43]

A complaint which alleged that plaintiff had been engaged in handling shipments of the commodity damaged, as a general consignee, for several years, and also alleged that the particular shipment was billed by him at the place of shipment and consigned to himself at the place of destination was sufficient, without averring whether or not the legal title was in himself or in others.[44] In an action under the Carmack amendment to the Interstate Commerce Act, the declaration must allege that plaintiff is the lawful holder of the bill of lading, or, if no bill of lading was issued, must allege plaintiff's right to recover had it been issued, and show whether or not a bill was issued.[45]

c. Consideration for Carriage

In actions ex contractu for loss of, or injury to, the goods, plaintiff should allege that the defendant was to receive a consideration; but no consideration need be alleged in actions ex delicto. An allegation of payment or tender of the freight charges is, ordinarily, not essential.

In actions ex contractu for loss of, or injury to, the goods, the complaint should allege that defendant was to receive a consideration for transporting the goods,[46] but it will be sufficient to allege generally that the conveyance of the goods was in consideration of a reward to be paid, without specifying what the reward was.[47] In an action ex delicto for injury to the goods, it is unnecessary for plaintiff to allege that any consideration was paid or agreed to be paid,[48] and it would seem that such allegation would not only be unnecessary, but improper.[49]

Alleging payment or tender of freight charges. Ordinarily, it is not essential to allege payment or tender of the freight charges,[50] at least where it appears that plaintiff's claim for damages is sufficient to offset defendant's claim for freight.[51]

d. Delivery to, and Acceptance by, Carrier

The plaintiff must state facts showing delivery of the goods to, and acceptance by the defendant as a common carrier for hire, and the time of such delivery and acceptance.

The petition or complaint must, by sufficient averments, allege a delivery of the property to the carrier,[52] and that defendant accepted or undertook to carry the goods so delivered to it,[53] as a common carrier for hire.[54]

Time of delivery and acceptance. The petition or complaint should allege,[55] at least in general terms,[56] the time when the property was delivered to defendant for transportation.

e. Description and Condition of Property

The plaintiff's pleading should describe the property lost or injured with reasonable certainty. If the shipment is under a bill of lading, the description need not be more particular than that in the bill. The necessity of alleging delivery of the property to the carrier in good condition has been both affirmed and denied.

The petition or complaint should show what the shipment was,[57] and describe the property lost or injured with a reasonable degree of certainty.[58] If the goods are shipped under a bill of lading, it is not necessary to describe them more particularly than they are described in that instrument.[59]

59. Mo.—Camden v. The Georgia, 6 Mo. 381.

Condition of property. In an action for damage to a shipment, it is necessary to allege that the property was in good condition when it was delivered to the carrier;[60] but there is contrary authority.[61]

f. Negligence

(1) Necessity and propriety of pleading
(2) Sufficiency of allegations

(1) Necessity and Propriety of Pleading

In a common-law action against a carrier for loss or injury to property shipped, the plaintiff need not allege that the defendant was negligent, except where such negligence is made essential by reason of special contractual limitations on the carrier's common-law liability. Negligence of a private carrier must be alleged.

Since a carrier is liable at common law, regardless of its negligence, for all loss or injury to the property in its possession as carrier, not caused by the act of God or the public enemy, or by the inherent nature of the property, or by the act or fault of the shipper, as stated supra § 71 et seq, plaintiff in a common-law action to recover for loss or injury to goods shipped need not allege negligence on the part of the carrier,[62] although it is not unusual to insert such allegation in the declaration,[63] both in actions of tort,[64] and in actions of contract.[65] So, a declaration in assumpsit, alleging a contract by defendant to transport and deliver the property in as good condition as when it was received by the carrier is not rendered insufficient by an allegation that defendant's conduct was negligent, the allegation of negligence being mere surplusage.[66] If, by reason of special contractual provisions limiting the carrier's common-law liability, negligence on the part of the carrier becomes an essential element of a right of action for loss of, or injury to, the goods shipped, it is of course necessary that the declaration should allege negligence on the part of the carrier.[67] Where an interstate shipment was transported on a through bill of lading, the petition need not allege that the loss or injury was due to the carrier's negligence, except in cases where no notice of plaintiff's claim was given, or where no claim was filed within the time required by the bill of lading or shipping receipt.[68]

Negligence of private carrier. Where recovery is sought for loss of goods transported by a private carrier, the consignor must plead that the loss was due to the carrier's neglect.[69]

(2) Sufficiency of Allegations

A direct allegation that the defendant was negligent is unnecessary where the facts stated warrant an inference of negligence. Negligence may be charged in general terms, although there is contrary authority.

The general rules as to the sufficiency of plaintiff's initial pleading, especially in actions for negligence, are usually applicable in actions against carriers for loss or injury to property shipped, due to the carrier's negligence.[70] A direct allegation

Pleading held sufficient

(1) In an action for failure to deliver produce and injury to it while delayed by act of God, allegations that defendant failed to notify the shipper to procure retransportation, or to make extra efforts to preserve the shipment, were not erroneous on the ground that no duty rested on defendant to give such notice as a matter of law, since the matters pleaded might be considered in determining whether or not defendant used due care.—American Ry. Express Co. v. Home Star Produce Co., Tex.Civ.App., 276 S.W. 790.

(2) Complaint alleging that defendant railroad as a common carrier accepted specified quantity of flour for shipment, and that defendant "was negligent in and about the handling of such flour on said shipment, in this, that the defendant negligently allowed or permitted the said flour to become wet and damaged by wa-

that defendant was negligent is not necessary where facts are alleged which warrant an inference of negligence.[71]

Specifying acts of negligence. It is sufficient to charge negligence on the carrier's part in general terms, without specifying the particular acts of negligence,[72] and allegations of specific acts may be treated as surplusage.[73] On the other hand, it has been held that defendant has the right to require a clear and specific statement of what facts are relied on by plaintiff to show negligence,[74] but that the deficiency of the petition in this respect can be reached only by a special exception,[75] and not by a general demurrer.[76]

g. Statement of Contract or Duty

(1) Actions ex contractu
(2) Actions ex delicto

(1) Actions ex Contractu

In actions ex contractu for loss or injury to property shipped, the general rules of pleading govern so far as applicable. The plaintiff must state what the contract was. Under the Carmack amendment the plaintiff need not plead that the contract was in writing.

In an action ex contractu for loss of or injury to goods shipped, plaintiff must allege contractual relations between plaintiff and defendant,[77] and state what the contract was;[78] and, under some statutes, where the contract is evidenced by a bill of lading, the bill, or a copy thereof, must be filed with the complaint.[79] In assumpsit on a contract of interstate carriage, an averment of defendant's undertaking and breach thereof, in general terms, is sufficient, without declaring specially on the receipt or bill of lading.[80] Under the Carmack amendment requiring contracts for shipment in interstate commerce to be in writing, but not providing that a contract not in writing shall be void, plaintiff need not plead a written contract of shipment.[81]

In accordance with the general rules of pleading, the allegations of the declaration must not be inconsistent,[82] and if the contract is in the alternater, to the plaintiffs' damage aforesaid," was held sufficient to plead defendant's negligence.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Sarris & Collas, 95 So. 903, 209 Ala. 217.

Negligence of servants

Complaint, in action for injuries to shipment of mules, alleged to have resulted from the negligence and misconduct of the carrier or its servants or agents, was held sufficiently to show that the agents were acting within the scope of their employment.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Benton Mercantile Co., 121 So. 716, 219 Ala. 223.

71. Tex.—Panhandle & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Thompson, Civ.App., 250 S.W. 751.

Pleadings held sufficient

F. Ry. Co. v. Thompson, Tex.Civ. App., 250 S.W. 751.

(2) So, a petition setting up the fact that defendant's loading pens were so muddy as not to be proper for the loading of cattle was not subject to general demurrer, although not charging in specific words that defendant was guilty of actionable negligence.—Lancaster v. Sayles, Tex.Civ.App., 234 S.W. 227.

Tex.—Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Neubauer, Civ.App., 103 S.W.2d 182.

Sufficiency of pleading

In shipper's action against railroad for damage to cattle, shipper's allegations that the railroad was negligent by reason of delays on sidings and switches, rough handling, and sudden stop of train because of collision, or near collision, with motor car or section hand car, resulting in damage to cattle, were sufficient, as against objection that allegations were too general and did not specify in what the alleged negligence consisted.—Panhandle & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Sanderson, Tex.Civ.App., 218 S.W. 540, dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

75. Tex.—St. Louis, B. & M. Ry. Co. v. Marcofich, Civ.App., 185 S.W. 51, affirmed, Com.App., 221 S.W. 582.

Sufficiency as against general demurrer

(1) A petition for injuries to live stock was held not subject to general demurrer, where it alleged that it was defendant's duty to notify plaintiff of the arrival of the shipment, that it failed to do so, and that defendant negligently placed them in open and unprotected pens, thereby exposing the stock to the heat of the sun, in direct consequence of which several of the animals died and others were injured, although there was no direct allegation as to how or in what manner it became defendant's duty to notify plaintiff of the arrival of the live stock.—Hovencamp v. Union Stockyards Co., 180 S.W. 225 107 Tex. 421, modifying Union Stockyards Co. v. Hovencamp, Civ.App., 144 S.W. 704.

(2) A petition alleging railroad roughly, carelessly and recklessly handled cattle during transportation, unloading, and reloading, was held sufficient against general demurrer.—Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Conn, Tex.Civ.App., 30 S.W.2d 939

82. Del.—Thomas v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 50 A. 285, 19 Del. 81.

Nature of inconsistency

A demurrer will be sustained to a declaration which alleges an agreement that the goods consigned should tive, it should be so counted on in the declaration.[83] It is not necessary to aver the meaning of terms used in the complaint that have acquired a fixed and definite meaning that courts and juries will readily understand.[84] Conditions in the contract limiting the carrier's liability should be stated in order to admit proof thereof, as will appear infra § 253½. If there are provisions in the contract other than are usually embodied therein, it is not necessary to aver the reasons that influenced, or the purposes that controlled, the shipper or the carrier in inserting them.[85]

Collateral stipulations. Where the contract contains several distinct parts and collateral provisions, it will be sufficient to state so much of it as contains the entire act or duty which is to be performed and the entire consideration for such act or duty.[86]

(2) Actions ex Delicto

In actions ex delicto the plaintiff need not set out the precise terms of the contract of shipment or the legal duty arising therefrom. A statute requiring a copy of the contract sued on to be filed is not applicable to a tort action for injury to a shipment.

Where a shipper elects to bring an action ex delicto against a carrier for damages arising from failure on its part to perform its duties as common carrier, he need not set out the precise terms of the contract of shipment, and the legal duty to be adduced therefrom, since, if the declaration alleges that defendant is a common carrier, duties imposed on it by the common law follow as a matter of course.[87] So, it is not necessary to allege that it was defendant's duty to carry the goods safely, such duty being implied by law from the relation of common carrier to the goods.[88] A statute requiring a copy of the contract sued on to be filed with the declaration is not applicable in an action on the case for injury to a shipment.[89]

h. Notice of Claim for Loss or Damage

According to some decisions the plaintiff must plead compliance with a stipulation of the contract of shipment for presentation of a notice of the claim for damage to the property, while other cases hold that this is a matter of defense. Compliance by the plaintiff with such provision need not be averred when he sues in tort. A complaint alleging the giving of notice to the defendant's agent is not defective for failure to state the agent's name; and an allegation in a suit by the consignor and consignee that the consignor presented the claim has been held sufficient.

It has been held by many authorities that, where the contract of shipment contains a valid requirement that a claim for damages for loss or injury shall be given within a specified time, the declaration or complaint in an action on the contract must allege the giving of such notice, or allege a waiver by the carrier of a compliance with the requirement, or state facts which would amount to an excuse for failure to do so.[90] There are, however, a number of cases, even in jurisdictions where the above rule has been upheld, where the courts have taken the view that the contractual provision for notice of the claim is a matter of defense, and hence that plaintiff need not aver compliance therewith,[91] and this would seem to be the rule where plaintiff does not sue on the contract but seeks to recover in tort on defendant's common-law liability.[92]

Sufficiency of pleading. An allegation in a petition for injury to an intra-state shipment of live be delivered in accordance with the directions of the consignor and not to the consignee, and which further alleges that such agreement was subject to the conditions of a written bill of lading which directed the delivery of the goods to the consignee. —Thomas v. stock that notice of a claim for the damage was given to an agent of the carrier is not insufficient for failure to set forth the name of the agent.[93] A complaint by a consignor, in which the consignee was joined as a party plaintiff, alleging that the consignor presented a claim for loss within the time required by the bill of lading, was not demurrable on the ground that title to the goods had passed to the consignee, and that no claim had been presented by him, where it did not appear from the complaint that a claim for loss must be filed by the consignee, or that it may not be filed by the consignor.[94]

i. Damage or Injury Sustained

A plaintiff suing a carrier for loss or injury to property shipped must allege the nature of the damages sought to be recovered. Special damages should be specially pleaded.

The petition or complaint in an action for loss or injury to property shipped should allege clearly the nature and amount of the damage for which recovery is sought,[95] or state facts sufficient to furnish a basis for the calculation of such damage;[96] but the measure of damages, being a rule of law governing the admission of evidence, need not be pleaded in order to state a cause of action.[97] Where there are several acts of negligence, plaintiff need not allege separately the several items of damages, or the amount thereof, arising from each act of negligence.[98] Immaterial allegations may be ignored as merely surplusage.[99]

Special damages for injury to, or loss of, a shipment must be specially pleaded.[1]

Expenses incurred or paid, if sought to be recovered as part of the damage sustained, must be sufficiently pleaded[2] and alleged to be reasonable and necessary.[3] A petition which alleges that plaintiff

(1) Petition against carrier by consignor-consignee who refused to accept delivery of watermelons because of depreciation caused by delay in delivery, alleging damage in amount of specified market value of melons at time they should have arrived, was held not generally demurrable, although petition showed that melons had some value on their arrival and did not specify such value.—Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Tifton Produce Co., 179 S.E. 125, 50 Ga.App. 614, conforming to answers 176 S.E. 624, 179 Ga. 624, 96 A.L.R. 772.

(2) A petition alleging the number of sacks of potatoes shipped, the gross weight and value of the shipment, and the percentage of damaged potatoes, together with the amount claimed therefor, is sufficiently definite.—J. H. Walker Co. v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 143 S.E. 782, 38 Ga.App. 284.

(3) A petition by a shipper for injury to live stock was sufficient against special exception that it did not apprise defendant of nature of damages or elements thereof, and that plaintiff was required to plead the same with particularity, where the petition alleged the injury to consist of delayed delivery and unreasonable confinement of the stock without food and water, and fixed damage at a specified sum measured by the difference between the value of the animals in the condition in which they arrived and the value in the condition in which they should have arrived.—Panhandle & S. (2) A petition in an action for injuries to a shipment of live stock alleging generally that it was damaged to the extent of six hundred dollars, without allegation as to its market value at the point of destination, is sufficient, since when there is evidence to take the case to the jury it is for the court to instruct on the measure of damages.—Gulf, C. & S. In shipper's action against carrier for damage to live stock, fact that pleading included itemized statement of nature and amount of damages to each animal did not preclude plaintiff from recovering aggregate amount claimed under allegation of general damages.—Fort Worth & Denver City Ry. Co. v. Motley, Tex.Civ.App., 87 S.W.2d 551, error dismissed.

1. U.S.—Crail v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., D.C.Minn., 2 F.2d 287, reversed on other grounds, C.C.A., 13 F.2d 459, reversed Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Crail, 50 S.Ct. 180, 281 U.S. 57, 74 L.Ed. 699, 67 A.L.R. 1423

Pleading sufficient

In shipper's action against live stock carrier, allegation that on arrival of shipment at destination shipper was compelled to pay freight charges in amount in excess of what he would have paid if shipment had been continued to destination in two cars as called for by contract instead of three was a proper pleading of special damages.—Fort Worth & Denver City Ry. Co. v. Motley, Tex.Civ.App., 87 S.W.2d 551, error dismissed.

2. Ga.—Louisville & N. Ry. Co. v. Harrell & Murphy, 120 S.E. 35, 31 Ga.App. 126.

3. Tex.—Panhandle & S.F. R. Co. v. Shell, Civ.App., 265 S.W. 758.

Petition sufficient

Allegation of petition for damages to shipment of grain that, after rejection thereof by buyer, plaintiffs made diligent, but unsuccessful efforts to sell to others at destination, and were compelled to reship to elevator company elsewhere to have grain put in salable condition and diminish resulting damages, was held tantamount to allegation that expenditures for such purposes were reasonable and necessary.—Panhandle & S.F. R. Co. v. Shell, Tex.Civ.App., 265 S.W. 758.

incurred expense in treating an injured animal, but fails to state the amount of the expense, is demurrable.[4]

Interest as damages is sufficiently alleged in a petition praying, in the body and in the prayer for relief, for judgment for the difference between the invoice price of the goods and their value in their damaged condition at destination in a certain sum, with interest from the date of shipment.[5]

j. Anticipating and Negativing Defenses

Plaintiff need not negative matters of defense.

Plaintiff, in his initial pleading, need not anticipate and negative or avoid matters of defense. The fact that the loss or injury complained of was due to a cause which would exempt the carrier from its common-law liability, such as an act of God[6] or of the public enemy,[7] an inherent or latent defect in the property or natural deterioration,[8] or, where live stock is injured, the evil propensities of the animals,[9] is a matter of defense, and need not be negatived by plaintiff. So, also, a limitation of liability contained in the contract of shipment is a matter of defense which need not be negatived by plaintiff.[10]

k. Amendment

Amendments of the declaration or complaint may be allowed if they do not introduce a new cause of action.

In accordance with the general rules of pleading, amendments of the declaration, petition, or complaint may be allowed, in the discretion of the court, provided a new or different cause of action is not introduced.[11] The pleading cannot be amended so as to change an action ex contractu to one ex de-

Injury due to rain and mud

Amendments allowable

(1) Where a petition alleged that a shipment of lumber was never delivered, but was destroyed through negligence of the carrier, it was not error at the trial, three years after action brought, to allow an amendment alleging that, if any part of the lumber was delivered, it was after it had been wrecked and had become worthless, on account of which the consignee refused it.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Williams, 77 S.E. 168, 139 Ga. 339.

(2) Where, in an action to recover for damages to horses in transit, the statement of claim asked for damages on the implied or common-law liability of the carrier, the court may, after verdict for defendant and grant of a new trial, allow plaintiff to amend his statement, so as to charge the negligence more in detail, and refer to a special contract under which the shipment was made.—Vervaeke v. Adams Express Co., 79 A. 764, 230 Pa. 647.

Amendments not introducing new cause of action

(1) In shipper's action for damage to goods, petition alleging that they were consigned to third person, and failing to allege that title was in plaintiff, was subject to amendment by alleging that goods were consigned to plaintiff under order notify bill of lading and alleging plaintiff's title, this not setting up new cause of action.—Davis v. Carroll, 119 S.E. 422, 30 Ga.App. 719.

(2) In an action against a carrier for loss of freight burned at the place of delivery to the carrier, an amendment changing the destination from a point from without to a point within the same state does not introduce a new cause of action.—Charleston & W. C. Ry. Co. v. Duckworth, 66 S.E. 1018, 7 Ga.App. 350.

(3) In an action for injury to live stock in transit by defendant's alleged negligence from improper handling and delay in transportation, it was not error to permit an amendment particularizing the acts of negligence, in that the shipment was conveyed on trains slower than the regular trains, that it was mishandled between certain places and held for a stated number of hours at certain points, that a feed trough had been wrongfully permitted to remain in the car with the hogs, that the cattle were confined for a longer period than twenty eight hours, and that the shipment should have reached destination October 14 and did not arrive until the evening of October 16, the matters pleaded in the amendment being germane to the cause of action alleged in the original petition and merely making more definite the former allegations of negligence.—Batcham v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 192 N.W. 818, 195 Iowa 659.

(4) Amendment of complaint, in an action for injury to stock while being carried on defendant's line, changing the destination of the stock from the end of defendant's line, as alleged in the original complaint, to a place beyond, is not a change of cause of action, and its allowance is not error, the damages being confined to the injuries occurring on defendant's line.—Fell v. Union Pac. Ry. Co., 88 P. 1003, 32 Utah 101, 28 L.R.A.,N.S., 1, 13 Ann.Cas. 1137.

In South Carolina

(1) The court may allow an amendment alleging a new cause of action for the same injury and negligence alleged in the original complaint.—Holliday Co. v. Raleigh & C. R. Co., 74 S.E. 41, 91 S.C. 51.

(2) In an action against a carrier for negligently transporting live stock, the court under Code Civ.Proc. 1902 § 194, is authorized to allow an amendment to the complaint by eliminating allegation that plaintiff filed a claim, and that defendant was responsible for the loss, and licto,[12] nor can a declaration stating a cause of action at common law be so amended as to charge a purely statutory liability;[13] and where a petition alleges shipment, but not a special contract, plaintiff cannot be required to amend by stating whether he shipped under an oral or written contract;[14] but an amendment may properly be allowed to meet a variance between the declaration or complaint and the evidence, such as a variance with respect to the place of destination of the shipment,[15] or where the complaint sets up one contract and the proof tends to show a different contract.[16]

§ 252. Plea or Answer

a. In general
b. Exceptions to common-law liability
c. Contractual limitation of liability

a. In General

The plea or answer must comply with the general rules of pleading and state facts constituting a good defense. Defense available under the general issue need not be specially pleaded; otherwise a special plea is ordinarily required. A plea of the general issue admits the competency of the defendant to be sued by the name given in the declaration.

The plea or answer in an action against a carrier for loss of or injury to property in its possession must comply with the general rules of pleading and state facts constituting a good defense.[17] Matters of defense admissible under a plea of the general issue at common law, or under a general denial in code states, are discussed infra § 253½. As to defenses which are admissible under the general issue a special plea is not necessary,[18] and, if interposed, is bad as amounting to the general issue;[19] but the objection must be taken by special demurrer.[20]

On the other hand, defenses not admissible under the general issue or a general denial,[21] such as contributory negligence on the part of the shipper,[22] or the absence of negligence on the part of the carrier proximately contributing to the loss or the injury,[23] must be specially pleaded. Matters of confession and avoidance must be specially pleaded,[24] and the 17. Ky.—A. Arnold & Son Transfer & Storage Co. v. Weisiger, 6 S.W. 2d 1084, 224 Ky. 659.

Sufficiency of pleading

(1) In an action against a railroad company for loss of property destroyed while standing in defendant's terminal yard by an explosion of explosives in other cars in the yard, where it was alleged that defendant was negligent in failing to provide watchman or fire equipment, an answer alleging that the fire which caused the explosion originated on a boat lying at the terminal over which defendant had no control did not state a defense.—Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. John Lysaght, Limited, C.C.A.N.Y., 271 F. 906, affirming, D.C., John Lysaght v. Lehigh Valley R. Co., 254 F. 351, certiorari denied Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. John Lysaght, Limited, 41 S.Ct. 625, 256 U.S. 704, 65 L.Ed. 1180, error dismissed 42 S.Ct. 53, 257 U.S. 613, 66 L.Ed. 397.

(2) In action against carrier for failure to deliver goods to consignee, plea that goods not delivered were such as could not be transported by carrier under its tariff provisions, which was not disclosed by inspection of the containers, could be interpreted as referring to all articles sued for and therefore was not objectionable on ground that it did not name articles to which it related.—Alabama Great Southern R. Co. v. Herring, 174 So. 502, 234 Ala. 238.

Due care

Where form of complaint predicates action on a duty as a common carrier, in order to acquit itself of liability on plea that it was not liable as common carrier because goods not delivered to consignee were such as could not be transported by carrier under its tariff provisions, carrier should assert that it did use due care.—Alabama Great Southern R. Co. v. Herring, 174 So. 502, 234 Ala. 238.

Estoppel

(1) Carrier's answer, alleging shipper's false statement of value of property destroyed, thereby obtaining a lower rate of transportation, without stating facts showing that defendant was deceived, and that such statement was material, did not set forth facts constituting estoppel —A. Arnold & Son Transfer & Storage Co. v. Weisiger, 6 S.W.2d 1084, 224 Ky. 659.

(2) Ground of defense, in action against carrier for damages to intrastate shipment, was held not to allege fraud supporting estoppel against shipper to assert value contrary to representation.—Chesapeake & O. Ry. Co. v. Osborne, 153 S.E. 865, 154 Va. 477.

Fraud

Answer alleging shipper's false statement of value of property destroyed, thereby obtaining a lower rate of transportation, held defective, so far as relying on the shipper's fraud, in not stating facts showing that carrier was deceived A. same is true of the defenses of estoppel,[25] partial loss only,[26] release of shipping contract,[27] that the contract of shipment is in violation of a rule of the railroad commission,[28] that part of the goods do not belong to plaintiff,[29] that the goods were injured by a connecting carrier and not by defendant,[30] and a waiver of the conditions of a special contract of shipment.[31] In order that the carrier may have unpaid freight charges deducted from the damages for goods destroyed it must plead them by way of counterclaim or set-off.[32]

A special plea must be sufficient to present the defense relied on,[33] and be responsive to, or as broad as, the declaration or complaint.[34] Where injury to perishable goods is caused by delay in transit, the causes of the delay are particularly within the knowledge of the carrier, and it is for it to excuse or explain such delay, and bring itself within an exception to its liability, if such exists.[35]

Plea in abatement. The necessity of a plea in abatement to raise the question of the nonexistence of a corporation being sued as a carrier follows the rules treated in the C.J.S. title Abatement and Revival § 91.

Admissions. In case for loss of goods, a plea of the general issue admits the competency of defendants to be sued by the name given in the declaration.[36]

b. Exceptions to Common-Law Liability

Matters constituting exceptions to defendant's common-law liability should ordinarily be pleaded.

Matters constituting exceptions to defendant's common-law liability as a common carrier must be specially pleaded.[37] Thus, where the carrier claims that the loss or injury was occasioned by the act of God or the public enemy,[38] or was due to the fault of the shipper,[39] it must allege such exception to the rule; and if the carrier relies on the fault of the shipper as exempting it from liability, the plea must negative all contributory fault on defendant's part.[40] On the other hand, it has been held that the defense that the injury to cattle was due to their inherent nature need not be specially pleaded, unless it appears that there was some inherent vice not common to cattle generally.[41]

c. Contractual Limitation of Liability

(1) In general
(2) Failure to give notice of claim
(3) Failure to sue within time limited

(1) In General

Contractual limitations on the defendant's common-law liability ordinarily require a special plea, except where the plaintiff has offered the bill of lading in evidence, and the defendant must allege facts showing that the limitation was reasonable and based on a sufficient consideration. The contract should be set out, together with the particulars in which the shipper failed to comply therewith.

Contractual limitations on the carrier's common-law liability must be specially pleaded by defend-

(1) Railroad company's plea, in shipper's action for negligent failure to transport carload of fruit, that plaintiff abandoned fruit and that defendant tried to reduce loss by selling it to best advantage and tendered proceeds to plaintiff, was held bad as interposing defense not responsive to case made by declaration —Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Baynard, 151 So. 5, 112 Fla. 544.

(2) Portion of defendant railroad company's plea, referring to state railroad commission's rule requiring shipper to give two days' notice of day on which he desires to ship fruit, held irrelevant where the declaration is not based on the failure of defendant to furnish a car, but on the negligent failure to transport loaded car of fruit—Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Baynard, supra.

(3) Where the complaint by a shipper against the carrier was in the code form, a special plea that, if plaintiff's mule was injured as the result of any defect in the car in which it was transported, defendant was not liable because of a provision in the bill of lading whereby the shipper agreed that he had examined the car, and that it was suitable, was demurrable because not so broad as the complaint.—Davis v. ant,[42] although there are decisions to the contrary in some jurisdictions where the common-law rules of pleading obtain.[43] Where, however, the bill of lading has been offered in evidence by plaintiff, its provisions limiting liability or the amount of recovery are available to the carrier without a special plea.[44]

It also devolves on the carrier to allege such facts as will show that the limitation is a reasonable one[45] and supported by a sufficient consideration.[46] If the carrier relies on the failure of the shipper to comply with the provisions of a special contract limiting the carrier's common-law liability, the contract must be set out in the answer and also the particulars in which the shipper has failed to comply with it,[47] although a defect of this nature has been allowed to be cured by amendment.[48] If a carrier relies on a special contract requiring the shipper to bed cars for live stock shipped, it must be alleged that he was given an opportunity so to do and that, if the cars were not properly bedded, it was through the shipper's fault.[49] Where the petition alleged that defendant failed to take proper care of stock shipped, and that it failed properly to water the stock, defendant might plead a contract of afreightment which requires the owner to accompany and to feed and water the stock himself.[50] It has also been held necessary to allege that the carrier was not guilty of any negligence contributing to the injury complained of.[51]

Limitation as to value. A plea setting up a stipulation that the liability of the carrier shall be computed on the basis of the invoice price of the goods, regardless of whether the loss was due to negligence, must allege that the loss was not due to wanton or willful misconduct amounting to a conversion or an affirmative repudiation of the duty to carry and deliver, but need not negative negligence.[52]

(2) Failure to Give Notice of Claim

Failure to give the defendant the notice of claim required by the contract must be specially pleaded, and facts stated showing the stipulation is reasonable and that there was no excuse for noncompliance therewith.

Some authorities have held that failure of plaintiff to give timely notice of his claim for loss or injury, as required by the contract of shipment, is a matter of defense which must be specially pleaded by defendant,[53] and an amendment seeking to cure

Storm or obstruction of track

Where the shipping contract released the carrier from liability for loss or injury to live stock due to a storm or obstruction of the track, allegations that storm released railway from liability was a complete defense, in absence of allegations of other negligence.—Hull v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 293 P. 479, 131 Kan. 781.

Strikes

A plea by a carrier alleging existence of a strike participated in by employees of the carrier, whose refusal to render services for which they were employed rendered it impossible to effect safe and expeditious delivery, under a contract limiting liability for delays in transportation due to strikes, is a good plea —American Ry Express Co. v. Johnson, 100 So. 743, 87 Fla. 451.

Allegation of contributory negligence

In action for damages to shipment of live stock under contract requiring shipper to feed and care for it and hold the carrier harmless for damages, except from its negligence, the allegations were held sufficiently to set up shipper's contributory negligence—Ft. Worth & D. C. Ry. Co. v. Allen, Tex Civ.App., 189 S.W. 765

Insufficient allegations

Allegations in the answer by railroad sued for injuries in intra-state shipment of live stock, setting out stipulations binding shippers to care for stock at own risk, were held insufficient as matter of law—Chauncey v. Kansas City, M. & O Ry. Co., Tex.Civ App., 32 S.W.2d 369

In Kentucky an answer alleging false statement of value of property destroyed thereby obtaining lower transportation rate, was held bad in asserting contract relieving carrier from common-law liability contrary to express provisions of Const § 196 —A. Verification of plea

(1) Where a statute provides that want of notice of claim shall be specially pleaded under oath, a plea alleging failure to give notice is in-such a defect has been denied,[54] although, on the other hand, it has been held that the carrier is not precluded from setting up noncompliance with the stipulation for notice, because it did not set up such defense until the filing of the second amended answer.[55] The carrier of an interstate shipment is not precluded from setting up in its answer the failure of the shipper to give notice of his claim, merely because the action was brought in the form of a common-law action for damages.[56]

Facts must be stated from which it will appear that the stipulation is reasonable,[57] and that no excuse existed for a noncompliance therewith.[58] Where a shipping contract provided that a written claim should be presented within a specified time, except where the loss or damage was due to specified causes, a plea which set up such provision, but failed to allege that the damage was not due to the excepted causes, was defective, and subject to demurrer.[59]

(3) Failure to Sue within Time Limited

Failure to comply with a stipulation requiring suit on a claim for loss or injury to be brought within a designated time must be specially pleaded, and facts must be alleged showing the reasonableness of the stipulation, unless the shipper has introduced in evidence the contract containing such stipulation.

If the carrier relies on a failure of the shipper to comply with a provision in the contract of shipment requiring suit to be brought within a designated time for loss or injury to the goods shipped, the contract must be specially pleaded,[60] and facts must be alleged showing that the stipulation was reasonable;[61] but the carrier is entitled to the benefit of such a provision where the contract containing it is introduced into evidence by the shipper.[62] The carrier of an interstate shipment is not precluded from pleading violation by the shipper of a stipulation in the contract of shipment requiring suit to be begun within a designated time, by the fact that plaintiff commenced his action in the form of a common-law action for damages.[63]

§ 253. Replication or Reply

Ordinarily, matters avoiding special defenses alleged in the answer should be set up in the reply.

Where the defense to an action for injury to goods is special,[64] as, for instance, nonpresentment of a claim for damages to goods within the period required by the contract,[65] or failure to bring suit within the time specified by the contract,[66] plaintiff should, unless otherwise provided by statute,[67] set up by reply matter avoiding such defense. So if a shipper claims that a release pleaded by the carrier was fraudulently obtained, this issue must be tendered by proper averments in the reply.[68] Where a shipper sues a carrier for loss of freight, without specifying any particular negligence as the cause of the loss, and the carrier charges that the loss was due to the shipper's negligence, the shipper must,

Where a company is sued for injuries to live stock during transportation, and sets up a special agreement to the effect that the owner was to give notice within forty days of his claim for injuries as a condition precedent to the right to sue, the effect of such defense is avoided by a replication showing that within three days after the injury defendant's agent promised to pay the damages if plaintiff would put them in a reasonable sum, that he was misled by various promises to pay until after the lapse of the forty days, and that during that time he acted under the belief that defendant meant to pay without suit—Gulf, C. & S F. under some statutes, reply to such new matter in the answer or be nonsuited.[69]

Admissions in reply. Where defendant pleads a condition requiring plaintiff to file a claim for damages within a specified time and his failure to do so, and the reply alleges that the condition is void, the admission in the reply of the existence of the condition not being express, its existence must be taken as denied by the denial implied by law to the allegation in the answer.[70]

§ 253½. Issues, Proof, and Variance

a. In general
b. Matters to be proved
c. Evidence admissible under pleadings
d. Variance

a. In General

The issues in an action against a carrier are only those arising from the pleadings.

The issues which arise for determination in an action against a carrier for loss of or injury to property shipped are those, and only those, properly presented by the pleadings,[71] although, as indicated infra subdivision c, an issue may under certain circumstances be raised by the evidence.

b. Matters to Be Proved

Ordinarily all material allegations in the pleadings must be proved as alleged.

In accordance with the general rule, every material allegation in the pleadings must be proved as alleged.[72] Where plaintiff pleads that the loss or injury was due to the negligence of the carrier he must prove the negligence as alleged,[73] even though the facts would permit suit against the carrier as an insurer;[74] and if specific acts of negligence are alleged plaintiff must prove such acts[75] and cannot rely on the presumption that arises from the damaged condition of the property on arrival, after de-

Iowa.—Ruebel Bros. v. American Express Co., 180 N.W. 658, 190 Iowa 600.

Pleadings sufficient to present issue

(1) Carrier's allegation in plea that act of God was proximate cause of loss to goods presented issue of negligence after notice of danger or negligence in not appreciating danger, regardless of where burden of proof existed.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Finlay, Ala., 170 So. 207.

(2) Liability as warehouseman was held sufficiently presented.—Hill Mfg. Co. v. New Orleans, M. & C. R. R. Co., 78 So. 187, 117 Miss. 548, certiorari denied New Orleans, M. & C. R. Co. v. Hill Mfg. Co., 39 S.Ct. 11, 248 U.S. 571, 63 L.Ed. 426.

Pleadings insufficient to present issue

(1) General allegation of damage to mule did not cover loss of services and cost of doctoring.—San Antonio & A. P. Ry. Co. v. Turner, Tex.Civ.App., 291 S.W. 329.

(2) General allegation of damage to cow in transportation did not cover loss of milk and cost of doctoring.—San Antonio & A. P. Ry. Co. v. Turner, supra.

Rule of court

In an action for loss of freight, where defendant's agent attached to the bill of lading, a copy of which plaintiff attached to his declaration, a notation of the shortage, the failure of defendant, which pleaded the general issue, to file an affidavit denying the execution of the notation, did not preclude it from denying the same, or from questioning the authority of the agent, under a rule of court providing that, on plea of the general issue "in an action upon any written instrument," plaintiff shall not be put to proof of the execution of the instrument unless defendant shall file an affidavit denying the same. The rule applies only to an instrument sued on.—Oceana Canning Co. v. King, 161 N.W. 895, 195 Mich. 628.

72. Proof of bill of lading alleged

Plaintiff, having chosen to found action on issuance of bill of lading instead of verbal contract for shipment, was bound to prove bill as condition to recovery.—Cudahy Packing Co. v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 196 S.W. 406, 196 Mo.App. 528.

Notice of claim for damages must be averred and proved.—Heath v. Sandersville R. Co., 98 S.E. 92, 23 Ga.App. 255.

Construction of pleadings as to matters alleged

(1) Allegations as to jerking of train causing injury to cattle were not specific allegations of negligence which plaintiff was required to prove, but merely of general rough handling.—St. Louis Southwestern Ry. Co. of Texas v. Weathersbee, Tex.Civ.App., 22 S.W.2d 986.

(2) Complaint alleging cattle were jostled and jolted, bruised and battered, during shipment, did not plead specific act of negligence so as to require proof thereof in order to warrant recovery.—Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Miller Bros., Tex.Civ.App., 22 S.W.2d 988.

Specific acts of negligence

Where there is an unaccompanied shipment of live stock, either interstate or intra-state, and death of animal occurs while in custody of carrier, shipper need not prove, under general allegation of negligence, specific acts of negligence on part of carrier, but it is sufficient if there is substantial evidence from which reasonable inference of negligence may be drawn.—Long v. Specific acts not alleged

In action for damages for injury

livery to the carrier in good condition.[76]

Where, however, plaintiff's pleading in an action for loss of oil in transit counted on defendant's common-law liability as insurer, an allegation that "defendant wrongfully drew out the oil" was held not to charge a specific act of negligence which plaintiff was required to prove as laid, but related rather to the alleged breach of defendant's obligation as insurer.[77] A plaintiff who merely pleads delivery of live stock to carrier in a sound condition, and failure to deliver to the consignee, may rely on the prima facie case of negligence arising from proof of such allegations.[78] Under a general allegation of negligence, a shipper suing for injury to an unaccompanied shipment of live stock need not prove specific acts of negligence.[79] A carrier delivering different shipments under different bills of lading, so commingled that it was impossible to prove the specific loss on each shipment, cannot require proof as to the particular damage to each particular shipment;[80] nor is plaintiff required to introduce in evidence a contract which was not made a part of his case against the carrier.[81] The carrier need not prove all the matters set up in its plea, if it proves enough to make out its defense.[82]

c. Evidence Admissible under Pleadings

(1) In general

(2) Under general issue or general denial

(1) In General

The proof must ordinarily be confined to the issues raised by the pleadings; but the scope of the pleadings may be enlarged by the evidence.

Ordinarily the proof must be confined to the issues raised by the pleadings, and evidence of matters not put in issue by the pleadings is not admissible.[83] Thus, in an action for damages to a ship-to live stock allegations of shipper of live stock against carrier held not to constitute specific allegations of negligence, hence shipper was not precluded from recovering for negligence not alleged—St. Louis, B. & M. Ry. Co. v. Murray, Tex.Civ.App., 40 S.W.2d 949.

Proof held sufficient

10 C.J. p 360 note 27 [c].

Matters not pleaded by plaintiff

(1) Where a carrier sent away and had repaired automobile injured in shipment, and consignee then refused it, proof in consignee's action should have been limited to value of machine at time of its return after being repaired, the carrier's subsequent liability as warehouseman not being pleaded.—Houston & T. C. Ry. Co. v. Iversen, Tex.Civ.App., 196 S.W. 908.

(2) In an action for injury to mules while in transit, evidence that the mules were "skinned up" when they arrived at their destination was inadmissible, where there was no allegation in the complaint of any external injury to the mules—Leddy v. Great Northern Ry. Co., 210 P. 354, 122 Wash. 136.

Defenses not pleaded

(1) In an action for damage to a shipment of cotton delayed in transportation, the court did not err in refusing to permit defendant to prove that unusual conditions existed which made it impossible to procure cars for more expeditious transportation, where the pleadings raised no such issue—Payne v. Orton, 234 S.W. 469, 150 Ark. 307.

(2) Where express company sued for loss of hog, did not plead the defense that the loss was caused by the inherent viciousness of propensities of the hog, defendant had no right to show it or claim protection from it, unless it appeared in the testimony of plaintiff—Boyd v. St. Louis Express Co., Mo.App., 211 S. W. 702.

(3) In shipper's action against carrier for loss resulting because carrier unauthorizedly permitted pickery to recondition cotton, evidence showing that reconditioning process was necessary under statute of state into which cotton was shipped was inadmissible where carrier did not plead facts and statute showing necessity for reconditioning—Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co v. Weaver, 47 P.2d 104, 173 Okl. 156.

(4) In shipper's action against railroad for loss of potatoes defended on ground that railroad had not accepted the shipment in any capacity, evidence was not admissible to show that it had accepted the shipment as an intermediate carrier, since such evidence would have been inconsistent with its defense—American Fruit Growers v. King, 114 S.E. 861, 122 S.C. 69.

Contributory negligence

In a shipper's action for the loss of sheep through drinking unwholesome water in a yard furnished by defendant, it was not error to exclude the shipping contract to show that the shipper himself undertook to unload the sheep and that he was guilty of contributory negligence, no

ment of cattle, the admission of evidence on the issue of a waiver of the terms of the shipment contract is error, where such issue was not raised by the pleadings.[84] So, in the absence of an allegation that special damages were incurred, evidence of special damages is not admissible.[85] Where plaintiff undertakes to specify the acts of negligence on the part of the carrier, he will be confined in his proofs within the limits of his specification,[86] although it has been held that this rule applies only to cases in which the action is based on negligence alone, and not where the petition alleges facts showing a contract relationship between plaintiff and the carrier.[87] Where the action is for negligent delay causing injury to live stock, and plaintiff pleads delays at certain designated stations, it is error to admit evidence that the stock was handled roughly all along the route.[88]

Enlarging scope of pleadings. It has been held that the carrier's evidence may broaden the pleadings, so as to permit proof of facts not expressly pleaded by plaintiff.[89] It has also been held that, where a written contract of shipment is definitely established by the evidence, the contract is admissible, although its issuance or contents was not pleaded by either party.[90]

(2) Under General Issue or General Denial

Under the general issue or a general denial a carrier may prove matters tending to controvert the case made by the plaintiff's pleadings. Evidence of a contract limiting defendant's common-law liability is usually admissible under the general issue; but in code states a general denial does not ordinarily authorize the introduction of such evidence.

A carrier sued for loss of, or injury to, property transported may, under the general issue, prove facts tending to controvert the allegations of the declaration or complaint which plaintiff must establish to sustain his claim.[91] It has also been held such defense nor any special contract having been pleaded—Byram v Payne, 201 P. 401, 58 Utah 536, 18 A.L.R. 1110.

Fraud

In action to recover for injury to a horse shipped, excluding testimony of carrier's agent showing shipper's fraud in representing value of intrastate shipment was not error, where fraud was not alleged as defense.—Chesapeake & O. Ry. Co. v. Osborne, 153 S.E 865, 154 Va 477.

Limitation of liability

Express receipt, stating value of interstate shipment, was held properly excluded in absence of pleadings raising issue of limitation of liability—American Ry. Express Co. v. Thompson, Tex.Civ.App., 2 S.W.2d 493.

Evidence warranted by pleadings

(1) In shipper's action against carrier for damages alleged resulting because carrier took live stock out of two cars and reloaded them in three, damages shown by testimony that after stock had been reloaded in three cars they had too much room and stood so far apart that they did not support each other held pertinent to facts alleged—Fort Worth & Denver City Ry. Co. v. Motley, Tex.Civ.App., 87 S.W.2d 551, error dismissed.

(2) In an action against a carrier for loss of oil by leakage, defendant's answer that its failure to deliver it was due to the shipper's fault in loading and forwarding it in a defective and insecure car and failing to properly close the outlet valve, was held sufficient to let in proof of the rusted condition of such valve at the time of the loss of a subsequent shipment in such car.—American Cotton Oil Co v. Davis, 224 P 23, 129 Wash. 24.

(3) Allegations that cotton was in sound condition when delivered to carrier, and damaged when delivered after unusual delay, were held sufficient to admit proof of damages caused by long delay, and, under Civ.Code art 2754, placing on carrier burden of showing loss was not due to its negligence—H P Richard & Sons v. Director General of Railroads, 107 So. 891, 160 La. 1019.

(4) Under allegations that live stock was not "safely" carried, but was injured by defendant's negligence, evidence as to the quality of hay and water furnished by defendant is within the issues—Heitman v Chicago, M. & St P. Ry. Co., 123 P. 401, 45 Mont. 406.

Acts of negligence

Carrier's evidence that in loading cattle it failed to install partition separating small cattle from large heavy cattle was held to enlarge shipper's pleading in action for damages so as to permit proof of improper loading, although not alleged by the shipper—Ker Texada v. Texas & P. Ry. Co, 133 So. 415, 16 La App. 66.

Condition of cattle prior to shipment

In action for damages to a shipment of live stock, evidence as to the condition of the cattle prior to shipment was not incompetent, notwithstanding there was no allegation in the complaint that the cattle were in good condition when received for shipment, defendants having raised the issue in the answer—Cravens v. Hines, Mo App, 218 S W 912

90. Kan—Abell v. Missouri Pac. R Co, 243 P 1031, 1032, 120 Kan 362, rehearing denied 244 P. 1044, 120 Kan 553
"The fact having been thus definitely established that the shipment was made under a written contract, the trial should not have proceeded upon the theory that such was not the case, and, with or without an amendment to the defendant's answer, the writing should have been admitted in evidence. . . . The practice of trying a claim against the carrier upon a theory directly contrary to the established and admitted facts, if permitted, would afford a ready means of evading that equality of treatment which is required in both interstate and local commerce"—Abell v. Missouri Pac. R. Co, supra.

that the carrier ordinarily may, under the general issue, prove a contract limiting its common-law liability,[92] although there is apparent authority to the contrary.[93] In those jurisdictions which have adopted the code system of pleading, it is always competent to prove under the general denial any facts which controvert the material allegations of the complaint.[94] Thus, under a general denial of the negligence charged by plaintiff as causing injury to animals, defendant may show that the injury was due to the inherent nature of the animals.[95] So, where the carrier pleads that the act of God was the proximate cause of the loss, a general denial by plaintiff raises the issue of whether something else was the sole proximate cause;[96] but a general denial does not authorize the introduction of evidence not controverting or tending to disprove any fact which plaintiff is bound to establish to sustain his cause of action, as that the goods were transported by an independent carrier from an intervening point to their destination, where they were damaged,[97] that the loss was only partial,[98] or that plaintiff had released the contract of shipment;[99] nor is a defense that the damage to a shipment of meat was caused by being packed by plaintiff in defective refrigerator cars covered by a general denial.[1] In an action on a carrier's common-law liability for the loss of property shipped, evidence that the shipment was made under a written contract limiting defendant's common-law liability is not usually admissible under a general denial,[2] although some authorities have held that a general denial authorizes the admission of such contract.[3]

d. Variance

A substantial variance between the pleadings and proof precludes recovery. The plaintiff cannot declare on one contract and recover on another, nor can the defendant succeed on a defense not pleaded; but an immaterial variance will be disregarded, and this applies to a variance between the notice of claim and the pleading and proof thereof.

As in other civil actions, any substantial variance between the allegations of the pleadings and the evidence is fatal to recovery.[4] Plaintiff cannot set up one cause of action and recover on another;[5] nor

Ownership of property
There is a fatal variance between a petition alleging injury to cattle jointly owned by the plaintiffs and praying for a joint recovery and proof of a separate cause of action in favor of each plaintiff.—International & G. N. Ry. Co. v. Reed, Tex. Civ.App., 189 S.W. 997

Time of shipment or delivery
In assumpsit against a carrier for loss of goods, evidence of a loss of goods shipped or delivered at any other time than that alleged in the writ constitutes a variance.—Witzler v. Collins, 70 Me. 290, 35 Am.R. 327

Identity of consignee
In buyer's action against carrier for damage to goods sustained during transportation, variance between pleadings alleging that the carrier had accepted the goods for shipment to the buyer and proof that the seller had in fact consigned the shipment to himself for delivery to buyer on payment of draft with bill of lading attached was fatal.—Louisville & N.R. Co. v. Sarris & Collas, 95 So. 903, 209 Ala. 217.

Liability as warehouseman
Plaintiff, having sued defendant on its liability as a common carrier, cannot recover on its liability as a warehouseman.—Normile v. Oregon Nav. Co., 69 P. 928, 41 Or. 177.

Liability as private carrier
Under a complaint charging defendant as a common carrier, no recovery can be had on proof of a liability as a private carrier only.—Honeyman v. Oregon, etc., R. Co., 10 P. 628, 13 Or. 352, 57 Am.R. 20.

No variance
(1) In action for damages to a shipment of horses, there was no variance between allegations of breach of contract to transport horses in properly constructed and maintained standard express car and proof of uniform live stock contract for transportation of other than ordinary live stock.—Green v. American Ry. Express Co., Mo.App., 34 S.W. 2d 1039

(2) Petition against carrier for damage to merchandise, not alleging joint ownership of merchandise by various plaintiffs, was not at variance with proof of plaintiffs' ownership.—Atlanta, B. & C.R. Co. v. Hart, 155 S.E. 375, 42 Ga.App. 194

No failure of proof
In an action ex delicto against a carrier of live stock, there is no failure of proof as against motion to dismiss where there is sufficient evidence to prove breach of duty, and no substantial ground of error where it appears that the carrier was given the benefit of the valid and applicable limitations in the shipping contract.—Werner v. United States Railway Administration, 181 N.W. 80, 47 N.D. 49.

Pleading delay and proving negligence
Where shipper's complaint for

can defendant succeed on a defense not pleaded.[6] Where plaintiff does not allege that defendant was a common carrier, no recovery can be had against it in that character.[7] Either the duty on which defendant's liability is alleged to be founded or the contract out of which its tort arises must be stated, and a material variance between the duty or the contract as stated and the proof in support thereof may be fatal to a recovery;[8] for, whether the action is in form ex contractu or ex delicto, if the cause of action as set forth originates in a contract, the contract must be proved as laid.[9] Where plaintiff declares on a common-law or implied contract and proves a special contract inconsistent with defendant's common-law liability, there is a fatal variance;[10] and, conversely, if a special contract is pleaded there can be no recovery on an implied contract.[11] So, unless there is some statutory authority to the contrary,[12] if a parol contract is pleaded, there can be no recovery on proof of a written contract.[13] Where a declaration is on a promise to do several things, and only one is proved, there is a material variance.[14] If the declaration alleges an unqualified contract to carry, and the contract proved is to carry, defendant not being answerable for certain risks, there is a variance.[15] Where a complaint in an action against a carrier charges a nondelivery of the goods consigned for carriage, no recovery can be had for an injury to the goods in transportation.[16]

An immaterial variance will not preclude recovery,[17] and a variance is not regarded as material if the adverse party is not surprised or misled thereby to his prejudice.[18] Failure to prove a particular aldamage to shipment is based on unreasonable delay in transportation, recovery could not be had on ground of negligence in failing to heat car properly and take necessary precautions against freezing of shipment.—Rezsek v. Southern Pac Co., 181 N.Y.S 117, 111 Misc. 180

Negligence not specified

(1) Plaintiff could not recover damages caused by rough handling of stock shipment where the only negligence alleged was carrier's delay.—Baker v. Bush, Mo.App., 194 S W 1061.

(2) The court can only submit to jury and plaintiff can only recover on special acts of negligence pleaded and relied on to support cause of action for delay and injury to cattle shipment—Lancaster v. Daggett, Tex Civ.App, 272 S.W. 340.

New contract diverting shipment

Where the consignee, after the goods have reached their original destination, orders them diverted to another point, a new contract of transportation is made, which constitutes a variance from the contract alleged in the declaration.—Nellis v. Grand Trunk Western Ry. Co, 220 Ill.App 445.

Time of issuance of bill of lading

Declaration on bill of lading, alleged to have been issued before goods were laden, held not material variance with proof of execution after cars were loaded.—Charles J. Webb & Sons v. Central R Co of New Jersey, C.C.A N Y., 36 F 2d 702, affirming, D.C, Charles J Webb Sons Co v. Central R. Co. of New Jersey, 28 F 2d 392

Description of property

In an action against a carrier for failure to comply with a contract to carry and deliver a draft, a variance between the complaint alleging that it was signed "John Q. Jackson," and proof that it was signed "John Q. Jackson, Agent," was immaterial—Zeigler v. Wells, 28 Cal. 263.

Weight of goods

In assumpsit against a carrier where the declaration alleged that plaintiffs delivered to defendant a large quantity of wool, namely, seven thousand eight hundred and thirty pounds, which defendant promised to transport, and the proof was of a less quantity, there was no variance—Deming v. Grand Trunk R. Co., 48 N H. 455, 2 Am R 267.

Assignment of claim

In an action on an assigned claim for damages to a shipment of live stock through delay in transportation, variance between the complaint, alleging the shipper assigned the claim for valuable consideration to plaintiff, and proof, showing the assignment was merely for collection, and that the shipper retained his beneficial interest, held immaterial, and not amounting to a failure of proof—Rice v Chicago, M. & St P Ry. Co, 197 P. 999, 59 Mont. 570

Identity of consignee and place of destination

In action for injury to mules while in transit, based on defendant's common-law liability as common carrier, fact that bill of lading named another than plaintiff as consignee, and a place other than point of delivery as destination, did not show a fatal variance, and bill of lading, as part of named consignee's deposition, was admissible for purpose of identification.—Atlantic Coast Line R. Co v. J S Carroll Mercantile Co., 104 So 413, 213 Ala 234.

18. Ala.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Northwestern Fruit Exch., 98 So. 382, 210 Ala. 519

Pleading liability as common carrier and proof of liability as warehouseman

In consignee's action for damages

legation which is not essential to the cause of action is not a material variance.[19] So, where negligence is alleged in an action based on the carrier's common-law liability, failure to prove negligence is not a variance, and plaintiff may recover if he proves a case under the common-law rule respecting the carrier's liability.[20] On the other hand, if plaintiff actually proves the allegations of negligence he may recover, even if there are circumstances limiting the responsibility of the carrier below the common-law rule.[21] In an action based on the carrier's failure to redeliver all of the cattle consigned to it for shipment, and for negligence in permitting cattle to escape from stock pens, failure to prove the allegations of negligence does not preclude recovery for failure to redeliver all the cattle shipped.[22] Where a complaint is in the code form for injury to animals, based on the carrier's common-law liability, recovery may be had, on proper proof, for breach of the carrier's contractual obligation at common law, or on the bill of lading,[23] and, under such a complaint, the fact that the evidence showed that the shipment was made under bill of lading containing special limitations on the carrier's liability did not constitute a variance.[24] The fact that the petition in an action for injury to live stock, pleading specific injury to specific animals, included an itemized statement of the nature and amount of damage to each animal would not prevent recovery of the aggregate amount claimed under an allegation of general damage;[25] and, under a petition charging that contracts of shipment were entered into between plaintiff and defendant, plaintiff could recover on proof that contracts were made in the name under which it transacted business in certain territory.[26]

Absolute or alternative contract. When the contract stated is absolute, and the contract proved is in the alternative, the variance will be fatal.[27] On the other hand, a declaration alleging an alternative contract to deliver to plaintiff, or to a person named for plaintiff, is not supported by proof of a contract to deliver to and for such person;[28] nor does such proof support the allegation of a contract to deliver generally for plaintiff, without specifying to whom.[29]

Description of termini. Where the proof as to the termini of the transportation varies materially from the allegations of the declaration in that regard, such variance will be fatal to a recovery;[30] but a merely nominal variance is harmless.[31]

Interest as damages may be allowed, it seems, although not asked in the petition.[32]

Pleading and proof varying from notice of claim. A discrepancy of three days in the date of delivery specified in plaintiff's notice of claim and the date specified in the complaint and established by the evidence is not fatal to recovery.[33]

a. In General

The burden is on the plaintiff to prove the essential elements of his cause of action, and on the defendant to prove his defenses. The burden is on the party to prove facts peculiarly within his knowledge.

In an action against a carrier for loss of, or injury to, goods, plaintiff has, of course, the burden of proving the essential elements of his cause of action,[34] such as the fact that defendant is a common carrier.[35] Where the liability of a carrier has come into existence in relation to a shipment, it will be presumed that a loss in whole or in part occurred while the status of common carrier existed,[36] and if the loss did not occur during the status of common carrier, the burden is on the carrier to show the change in the relation to the shipment.[37]

In general, the burden is on plaintiff to show delivery of the goods to the carrier, an undertaking, express or implied, on the carrier's part to transport them, and nondelivery of the goods, or delivery in a damaged condition,[38] and until this is established, the carrier is not required to offer any evidence.[39] The carrier's general denial of a loss in transit casts on plaintiff the burden of establishing a prima facie case[40] Where, however, plaintiff has established a prima facie case, the burden is on the carrier to prove the matters of defense relied on[41]

Matters within knowledge of party. It is a general rule that the burden is on a party to such action to prove facts which are peculiarly or exclusively within his knowledge.[42]

Affirmative defenses

"It is well-settled that, in a case such as this, the plaintiff would have been entitled to a verdict upon its prima facie case, if no evidence had been introduced by the defendant, and, as the evidence introduced by the defendant was in support of an affirmative defense set up by it, and not merely in denial of the showing made by the plaintiff in its prima facie case, we think there is abundant authority to the effect that, as to such affirmative defense, the defendant was confronted with the necessity of establishing it, regardless of whether such necessity be called burden of proof, burden of evidence, or duty to go forward with evidence."—Vander Beek v. Chicago & N. W Ry. Co, Iowa, 278 N W. 201, 206.

Statutory rule

Rule of Civ Code 1910 § 3469, that in all cases of bailment after proof of loss the burden of proof is on the bailee to show proper diligence, is applicable to intra-state shipments "loss" meaning injury or damage to goods as well as their destruction or disappearance—Allen v Southern Ry Co, 126 S E. 722, 33 Ga App 209.

Okl—Oklahoma, N M & P. Ry Co. v. H M. S. Drilling Co, 229 P. 420, 100 Okl 260

Cause of injury

Burden was on carrier to show cause of injury to shipment, where facts were peculiarly within knowledge of its agents—Rio Grande & E. P. Ry Co. v T A Austin & Co, Tex Civ App, 12 S W 2d 1070, reversed on other grounds, Com.App., 25 S W. 2d 306.

b. Right to Sue

The burden is on the plaintiff to establish his right to sue.

The burden of proof is on plaintiff to show that the right of action, if any exists, is in him, as for instance that he is the owner of the goods.[43] While the possession of the bill of lading, even by assignment or mere delivery, raises the presumption that the one in possession is the "lawful holder," entitled to sue for loss of goods in transit under the Carmack amendment, such presumption is not conclusive but may be overcome by evidence that he is not the lawful holder of the bill.[44]

c. Delivery to, and Acceptance by, Carrier

The plaintiff has the burden of proving delivery of the goods to, and acceptance thereof by, the carrier in its capacity as a common carrier; but when the plaintiff has made a prima facie case on this issue, the burden is on the carrier to prove nondelivery, or that it did not receive the goods as a common carrier.

The burden is on plaintiff to show a delivery of the goods to, and acceptance thereof by, the carrier for transportation,[45] and where plaintiff establishes a prima facie case of delivery and acceptance,[46] as by the recitals of a receipt or bill of lading issued by the carrier,[47] the burden is on the carrier to prove nondelivery to it; and plaintiff's prima facie case is not overcome by a notation on the bill of lading, "shipper's load and count."[48] So, where an express company accepts a package with the shipper's valuation thereof, and without investigation, and issues a receipt acknowledging that it received property of that value, it has the burden of showing that the package did not contain articles of that value.[49] Proof that goods were delivered to a vehicle owned by the carrier, in charge of a person prima facie in the carrier's employment, places on the carrier the burden of proving that the inference of ownership and agency relied on by plaintiff was wrong.[50] Where usage and custom is relied on to show a constructive delivery of goods to a common carrier for transportation, the burden is on the party relying on such custom and usage to establish it.[51]

Plaintiff has the burden of showing that the goods were accepted by defendant in its capacity as a common carrier,[52] but delivery to the carrier raises a presumption that it received the goods as such, and places the burden on the carrier to show that it received them as warehouseman only.[53] In an action against a carrier for failure to protect freight in cars from injury by flood, plaintiff must show that the goods were in defendant's possession either as a carrier or as a warehouseman; and where the evidence shows that the goods were in plaintiff's possession his case fails.[54]

Amount delivered. Where the shipper undertakes to load and weigh or count the goods when delivered to the carrier, the burden is on him to show the amount delivered to the carrier.[55] On the other hand, the weight of the goods, stated in the bill of lading, being prima facie evidence of the amount

Ability to procure car in place of defective car

In action for damages to shipment of strawberries from defective refrigerator car, carrier could not avoid liability on account of shipper's knowledge of defects in car, without showing that another car could have been procured which would have materially avoided loss—Seneker v Lusk, Mo.App., 190 S.W. 96 received by the carrier, it has the burden of proving that it did not receive such amount.[56]

d. Condition of Goods When Delivered to Carrier

The burden is on the plaintiff to show that the goods were in good condition when delivered to the carrier, but when the facts raise a presumption that the goods were in good condition when delivered to the carrier, the latter has the burden of showing that they were not in good condition. If the goods were open to inspection, the burden of proving their bad condition when the carrier received them is on the carrier.

The ordinary presumption is that goods transported by a carrier arrived at destination in the same condition in which they were shipped.[57] Hence, in an action for injury to the goods, the burden is on plaintiff to prove that the property was in good condition when delivered to the carrier,[58] or to show a receipt acknowledging the good condition of the goods at that time,[59] or, at least, to show that the goods were in a better condition when delivered to the carrier than they were on arrival at destination.[60]

No presumption exists that the goods were in good condition when delivered to the carrier.[61] The presumption arises, however, from the fact of the receipt of the goods by the carrier without objection or exception noted in the bill of lading or shipping receipt, that as far as the condition was apparent on ordinary inspection the goods were in good condition.[62] Similarly, a carrier's acceptance of extra charges for heating and its issuance of a receipt therefor is prima facie evidence that goods were in good condition, and in case of damage from freezing the burden of proof is on defendant to show that it arose from a cause for which it was not responsible.[63]

A notation or statement in a bill of lading that the goods were received by the carrier in apparent good order or condition makes a prima facie case, and the burden is then on the carrier to prove that they were not in good condition when received,[64] and the same rule has been applied where the bill of lading admits that the goods were received in good order, except that the contents or condition of the contents of the packages were unknown.[65] On the other hand, it has been held that a mere recital in the receipt that the contents and condition of the packages were unknown does not raise a presumption that they were in good order when received by the carrier;[66] that no such presumption arises from a receipt reciting that the goods were in good condition, where they were not open to inspection;[67] and that, where the shipper loads the goods and the carrier merely issues a uniform bill of lading without special examination, a formal declaration that the goods were received in apparent good order does not require the carrier to assume the burden of showing its freedom from negligence.[68] If the damage to goods by water was apparent from exterior inspection on their arrival at destination, the carrier's failure to note the condition when receiving the goods, raises the presumption that the condition did not then exist.[69] The burden is on the carrier to show that goods open to inspection were in bad condition when received by it.[70] Where there is proof that the goods were damaged in transit, the burden is on the carrier to show that they were in bad condition at the time of shipment.[71] Proof of delivery of goods to a city expressman in good condition raises a presumption of delivery to the carrier in good condition;[72] but the rule that proof of delivery of the goods to a warehouseman in good condition raises a presumption of delivery to the carrier in good condition, does not apply where the goods have been stored with the warehouseman for a considerable time before their delivery to the carrier.[73] The carrier has the burden of proving that property delivered in a damaged condition was not that for which the bill of lading was issued.[74]

Where the defense is that the goods reached destination in good condition, it is immaterial whether the burden of proving that the goods were in good condition when received by the carrier is placed on plaintiff or on defendant.[75]

e. Proper Packing, Marking, and Loading

The burden is on the plaintiff to show that goods were properly packed and labeled.

Plaintiff has the burden of showing that the goods were properly packed, marked, and loaded, where these duties devolved on him.[76] However, where the carrier seeks to avoid liability because of the shipper's failure to mark the freight, as required by the regulations, it has the burden of proving what portion of the freight was not so marked.[77]

f. Nondelivery by Carrier or Delivery in Bad Condition

Ordinarily, the burden is on the plaintiff to show loss or nondelivery of the goods by the carrier, or a failure to deliver them in proper condition, and that the loss or injury occurred while they were in the carrier's possession. Where the plaintiff makes a prima facie case, the carrier has the burden of accounting for the loss or nondelivery.

The burden ordinarily is on plaintiff to show the loss or nondelivery of the goods by the carrier,[78] or a failure to deliver them in proper condition,[79] and and that the loss or injury occurred while the goods

Loss in weight of coal

In an action for loss of coal during transportation, plaintiff had the burden of proving that there was an actual loss of coal, notwithstanding loss in weight of coal during transportation, which might have been due to evaporation of moisture.—Davis v. Zimmern, 99 So. 307, 211 Ala 63.

Facts peculiarly within knowledge of plaintiff

Where a shipment of currency and coins was delivered to the carrier in a sealed sack, and the sack with the seal on it was delivered by the carrier to the consignee, who opened it out of the presence of any agent of the carrier, and claimed that the currency had been abstracted therefrom, the burden of proof on the issue as to whether the currency was delivered by the carrier to the consignee was on the consignee, since it was a fact peculiarly within his knowledge.—Skyland Hosiery Co. v. American Ry. Express Co., 114 S E. 823, 184 N.C 478.

were in the carrier's possession, it being insufficient to show a state of facts as consistent with the occurrence of the loss after delivery by the carrier as before.[80] It has been held that, when plaintiff has established a prima facie case by showing delivery of the goods to the carrier, the latter has the burden of proving that they were not lost while in its possession.[81] Proof that the injury occurred in transit may be made directly, or by means of the presumption arising from the fact that the goods were delivered by the carrier in a bad condition,[82] and such presumption continues throughout the trial;[83] but no such presumption arises where the shipment was twice broken, and its condition on reshipment was not shown.[84] Where plaintiff makes a prima facie case by showing delivery of the goods to the carrier and a loss thereof or failure to deliver,[85] or shows prima facie an unreasonable delay in making delivery of goods or live stock, resulting in loss or injury,[86] the burden then devolves on the carrier to excuse or account for the loss, nondelivery, or delay. So, where it is shown that goods were received by the carrier in good condition and delivered by it in bad condition, the burden is on the carrier to show that the injury did not occur while it had possession thereof,[87] or that the injury was due to some excepted cause, as stated infra this section subdivision h. The rule that proof of delivery to a railroad company of an interstate consignment in good condition and of its receipt in bad condition is a sufficient prima facie showing to establish the carrier's liability is not affected by the Carmack amendment.[88]

Slight evidence of nondelivery, however, is sufficient to throw the burden on the carrier of accounting for the goods.[89]

It has been held in some cases that, on proof of delivery to the carrier, the burden is on the carrier to establish that it delivered the goods to the consignee,[90] and that, on proof that the carrier received the goods in good condition, the burden then rests on it to show delivery in the same condition to the consignee.[91]

g. Injury to Goods While in Possession of Carrier as Such

The burden is on the plaintiff to prove that the damage occurred while the goods were in possession of the carrier, and before its liability had terminated, although some authorities have held that proof that the goods were received by the carrier in good condition, and subsequently damaged, casts on the carrier the burden of proving that the carriage of the goods had terminated prior to the damage.

In an action for damage to the goods, it is for plaintiff to prove that the damage occurred while the goods were in the possession of the carrier as such, and not after its liability as carrier had termi-

(2) Carrier has the burden of proof on its defense that damage to freight was caused by an unprecedented flood.—St. Louis Southwestern Ry. Co. of Texas v. Hughston Grain Co., Tex.Civ.App., 186 S.W. 429.

Inherent nature or defects

(1) When goods are received by the carrier in good condition and delivered by it in bad condition, it has the burden of proving the defense that the injury was due to the inherent nature of, or defects in, the goods.

(3) Carrier must show that loss of animal was due to its inherent vice or nature.—Sullivan v. American Ry. Express Co., 245 S.W. 375, 211 Mo.App. 123—Burgher v. Wabash Ry. Co., Mo.App., 217 S.W. 854—Boyd v. St. Louis Express Co., Mo.App., 211 S.W. 702.

(4) To relieve a carrier, not owning, furnishing, or supervising the loading of a car of oil, nor examining it for latent defects, from its common-law liability for safe delivery of the contents, the burden is on it to prove such defect and the reason therefor.—American Cotton Oil Co. v. Davis, 224 P. 23, 129 Wash. 24.

Natural evaporation

Carrier sued for shortage in shipment of coal has burden of proving defense that shortage was caused by natural evaporation.—Smith v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 209 N.W. 465, 202 Iowa 292.

(2) Carrier, sued for damage to iced car of eggs, resulting from delay in transportation, had burden of showing that shipper was negligent in not billing car more promptly.—Chicago, R. I. & G. Ry. Co. v. Abdou, Tex.Civ.App., 1 S.W.2d 493, error dismissed.

Improper packing, loading, or preparation for shipment

(1) The burden rests on a carrier to establish its defense that the loss itself from liability in the shipping contract, as shown infra subdivision i, of this section, the presumption being that the loss or injury resulted from some cause other than one which would exempt the carrier from liability,[95] and this rule is not affected by the Carmack amendment relating to the liability of interstate carriers.[96] So, where loss of the goods is conceded, the burden is on the carrier to show that such loss was due to some cause for which, as carrier, it was not legally liable.[97] The question as to the burden of proving negligence on the part of the carrier, where plaintiff's prima facie case has been met by proof that the loss or injury came within a contractually excepted cause is discussed infra subdivision 1 of this section.

i. Contractual Limitation or Extension of Liability

(1) Limitations in general
(2) Value of property; rates based on value
(3) Notice of claim and time for bringing suit

(1) Limitations in General

(a) General rules
(b) Reasonableness of stipulations
(c) Consideration
(d) Shipper's knowledge of, and assent to, limitations

(a) General Rules

The burden is on a carrier setting up a contract limiting its liability to prove the existence of a valid contract and to show that the loss or injury was due to a cause excepted therein; but, where this proof is made, the shipper, to avoid its effect, must show that the contract is invalid. The burden is on the carrier to prove a custom relieving it from liability.

No presumptions will be indulged in in favor of exemptions from common-law liability.[98] On the other hand, in the absence of proof to the contrary, it is a general rule that the liability of a carrier will be presumed to be its common-law liability, and any party attempting to show a greater or a less liability must assume the burden of proving the contract by which the common-law liability was affected,[99] nor is this rule affected by the fact that it is shown that the carrier was accustomed always to give to shippers a receipt limiting its common-law liability;[1] but it has been held that, where a live stock shipment is controlled by federal statutes and the regulations fixed by the interstate commerce comto goods was due to improper loading or packing.

Wash.—Wilson & Co. v. Hines, 213 P. 5, 123 Wash. 643.

(2) Railroad had burden of proof of affirmative defense that damage to crane was due to manner of preparation for shipment.—Western Machinery Exchange v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co., 254 P. 248, 142 Wash. 675.

(3) Burden is on carrier of live stock to show that injury thereto was due to the fault of the shipper or his agent in overloading the car in which the stock was transported.—Davis v. Sullivan & Opry, Tex.Com App., 258 S.W. 157, affirming, Civ App., 242 S.W. 764—Fort Worth & Denver City Ry. Co. v. Motley, Tex Civ App., 87 S.W.2d 551, error dismissed—Massey v. Texas & P. Ry. Co., Tex.Civ App., 200 S.W. 409.

Selection of vehicle

If the carrier relies on an act of the shipper in selecting vehicles for the transportation of the goods as excusing the carrier's liability with reference thereto, the burden of showing knowledge on the part of the shipper as to the defects in the vehicle, or that they were plainly apparent or visible, is on the carrier.—Harris v. Northern Indiana R. Co., 20 N.Y. 232.

Under the civil code of Louisiana, applicable to intra-state shipments, the carrier must prove that the loss or damage was caused by an accidental and uncontrollable event, construed by the courts as meaning a fortuitous or irresistible force.—Dejean v. Louisiana Western R. Co., 118 So. 822, 167 La. 111—National Rice Milling Co. v. New Orleans & N. E. R. Co., 61 So. 708, 132 La. 615—Noel Bros. v. Texas & P. Ry. Co., 133 So. 830, 16 La. Extent of presumption

Where goods are shipped in good condition and arrive at destination in a damaged condition, a party relying on the presumption that the damage resulted from some cause other than one that would exempt the carrier from liability has a right to rest secure until prima facie evidence has been adduced by the opposite party, but the presumption should never be placed in the scales to be weighed as evidence.—Eckman Chemical Co. v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 185 N.W. 444, 107 Neb. 268.

The Carmack amendment which invalidates the provisions of any state law nullifying contracts limiting a carrier's liability for loss or damage to the agreed value, and which makes no provision as to evidence, does not invalidate a state law expressly placing the burden of proof on the carrier to show that loss or injury occurred by reason of an excepted cause.—National Rice Mill Co. v. mission, and the extent of the carrier's liability depends on the rate paid, there is no presumption that the carrier assumed the common-law liability, and the burden is on plaintiff to prove that he accepted the schedule rate therefor.[2] In accordance with the general rule stated above, where the loss of, or injury to, property in the carrier's possession is shown, and the carrier relies as a defense on a contract relieving it from liability for certain excepted causes, the burden is on it to prove the existence of the contract,[3] and to show that the loss or injury complained of was due to a cause within the exceptions.[4] The burden also rests on the carrier to show such facts as will establish the validity of the contract,[5] as that the limitations in the contract are reasonable and supported by a sufficient consideration, as stated infra subdivisions (b), (c) of this section. On the other hand, when the carrier has shown that the loss or injury was within the contract exceptions, if the shipper seeks to avoid its effect, the burden is on him to show facts which invalidate the contract,[6] as that the contract was unfair and was imposed on him in such a way that he could not read or understand it.[7]

Stipulations in a contract limiting the carrier's liability, being generally matters of defense, it is not necessary that plaintiff produce the contract in making out his case;[8] but, where it appears from plaintiff's evidence that a written contract of shipment was entered into, and the carrier asserts a written contract containing limitations on its liability, it is incumbent on plaintiff to introduce the entire contract in evidence, and, if defendant introduces evidence as to the application of any provision therein precluding recovery, plaintiff must show why the provision relied on by the carrier did not control.[9]

It has been held that, where cotton was placed on a compress platform, and bills of lading were issued therefor, the inference is that the cotton was placed there for immediate transportation, and hence was on defendant's through route, so as not to fall within a clause of the bill of lading absolving a carrier from liability for loss or injury not occurring on its own road, or its portion of the through route.[10]

Special custom. If the carrier relies on a special custom to relieve it from liability, the burden is on it to establish such custom.[11]

(b) Reasonableness of Stipulations

The burden is on the carrier to show that the stipulations limiting its liability are reasonable, except where they have been approved by the interstate commerce commission.

11. Minn—Irish v. Milwaukee, etc., R. Co., 19 Minn. 376, 18 Am.R. 340.

The burden ordinarily is on the carrier to show that stipulations limiting its liability are reasonable,[12] although it has been held that limitations approved by the interstate commerce commission are conclusively presumed to be reasonable.[13]

(c) Consideration

According to some authorities a shipper seeking to avoid an agreement limiting the carrier's liability has the burden of proving want of consideration, while other authorities hold that this burden of showing a sufficient consideration is on the carrier in the absence of any evidence that a consideration was in fact given. It will be presumed that a private carrier's charges included compensation for an agreement extending its liability.

Some authorities have held that, where a contract limiting the carrier's liability is shown, the presumption is that there was a sufficient consideration consisting in a reduced rate or otherwise, and the burden is on the shipper, if he seeks to avoid the limitation on the ground of want of consideration, to establish that fact;[14] but, if abatement of rates is expressly forbidden by statute, there can be no presumption of a reduced rate.[15] Other authorities have held that, unless it appears from a recital in the contract, or otherwise, that a reduced freight rate or other consideration for the contract was given, the burden is on the carrier to prove that the contract for limitation of liability was supported by a sufficient consideration;[16] but, where this view prevails, the recital of a reduced freight rate is sufficient prima facie evidence of that fact, and casts on the shipper the burden of proving want of consideration.[17] The fact that a limitation of value of live stock appears in writing on the bill of lading does not raise a presumption of consideration for the limitation as against a showing on the face of the record that there was no consideration.[18]

Extension of liability of private carrier. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, it may be presumed that a private carrier's charges included compensation for a special contract imposing on him liability as insurer, a greater liability than the ordinary care imposed on him by law.[19]

(d) Shipper's Knowledge of, and Assent to, Limitations

In some cases the burden is held to be on the carrier to show assent by the shipper to a contract limiting the carrier's liability, while in others, the shipper has the burden of showing want of assent.

In jurisdictions where assent of a shipper to the terms of a contract limiting liability contained in a bill of lading is necessary, the burden is on the carrier, seeking to avail itself of such limitation, to prove that the shipper assented thereto,[20] in the absence of a statute otherwise providing,[21] although the rule has been held inapplicable to interstate shipments.[22] It has been held also that, even though the shipper signs the bill of lading containing limitations of the liability of the carrier, the burden is still on the carrier to show by evidence aliunde that the restrictions or limitations of the common-law liability contained therein were assented to by the shipper.[23] On the other hand, it has been held that the acceptance by the shipper, without objection, of a bill of lading or shipping receipt containing a limitation of the carrier's liability raises a presumption that he knew of, and consented to, the limitation,[24] especially where he or his agent prepared the receipt.[25] Such presumption, however, is not conclusive, but is subject to rebuttal.[26]

Presumptions and burden of proof as to shipper's knowledge of, and consent to, limitations in respect of value of property shipped see infra subdivision (2) immediately following.

(2) Value of Property; Rates Based on Value

The carrier ordinarily must prove facts entitling it to a limitation as to value of the property. The circumstances may raise a presumption of authority on the carrier's part to maintain rates based on an agreed valuation, that the rates were based on such valuation, and that the shipper had knowledge thereof; and that alternative rates were offered the shipper.

A carrier setting up a contractual limitation of liability to the value of the property received for shipment ordinarily has the burden of proving facts necessary to entitle it to such limitation.[27] Proof that a carrier had filed with the interstate commerce commission a tariff specifically referring to an order of the commission in proceedings to which the carrier was not a party, which permitted a limitation of liability to a stated value, and containing the form of receipt therein authorized, and that thereafter the carrier made its charges in conformity with such tariff, raises a presumption that the carrier was authorized by the commission to establish and maintain rates dependent on declared or agreed values.[28] A clause in the bill of lading stating that the agreed valuation of the property was on the basis of adjusted freight rates, which valuation is the limit of the carrier's liability, is prima facie evidence that the rate charged was based on the agreed valuation, from which it may be inferred that a choice of rates was given.[29] So, where a bill of lading signed by both parties recites that lawful alternate rates based on specified values were offered, such recitals constitute admissions by the shipper and sufficient prima facie evidence of choice; for, if in such a case the shipper wishes to contradict his own admissions, the burden of proof is on him.[30]

Knowledge of shipper. Where the carrier defends on the ground that the goods were shipped under the lower of two rates, thereby relieving the carrier from liability for a particular cause of loss or injury, the shipper is presumed to have had knowledge of the existence of the two rates.[31] So the shipper will be presumed to have had actual knowledge that the rates were based on the value of the property, where the rates covering the shipment had been duly established and maintained by the interstate commerce commission,[32] but, while this is the general rule, it has no application where the property is shipped free, pursuant to an act of congress.[33]

(3) Notice of Claim and Time for Bringing Suit

In some jurisdictions the burden is on the shipper to prove compliance with a stipulation for notice of his claim, or a waiver thereof, or excuse for failure to comply. In other jurisdictions the burden is on the carrier to show the existence of a contract for notice of claim, the reasonableness of the requirement, and noncompliance therewith. The carrier also has the burden of showing the existence of a limitation as to the time of commencing suit against it.

must plead the giving of notice of his claim for loss of, or injury to, property in possession of a carrier, as stated supra § 251 h, the burden is on plaintiff to prove a compliance with such requirement,[34] or a waiver thereof,[35] or excuses for failure to comply;[36] and it has been held that this is so, although plaintiff did not sue on the written contract, but alleged a contract in general terms, and the carrier set up the contract in the answer.[37] Also the burden is on the shipper suing for damage to live stock to show that there was no consideration for a provision in the bill of lading covering an interstate shipment requiring notice of a claim for damages to be given within five days after the stock was unloaded.[38]

Where the rule obtains that failure to give the required notice of claim is a matter of defense to be specially pleaded by the carrier, as stated supra § 252, the burden rests on the carrier to show the existence of a contract containing such requirement,[39] the reasonableness of the requirement,[40] and a noncompliance therewith on the part of the shipper.[41]

Limitation as to time for bringing suit. Where the carrier asserts as a defense that it had filed with the interstate commerce commission a schedule and form of receipt containing a stipulation as to the time when suit must be commenced, and that the suit was not brought within the stipulated time, it has the burden of proving the existence of such stipulation.[42]

j. Negligence in Carriage of Inanimate Freight

(1) In general
(2) Where negligence is in issue in general
(3) Where defense is based on common-law exception

(1) In General

Ordinarily it is not incumbent on the plaintiff to prove negligence on the part of the carrier in an action to enforce its common-law liability.

The liability of a carrier for loss of, or injury to, goods in its possession being that of an insurer, no proof of negligence is ordinarily necessary,[43] although it has been held that, if plaintiff unnecessarily alleges that the loss or injury was due to specific acts of negligence, the burden is on him to prove them.[44]

(2) Where Negligence Is in Issue in General

Where the burden is on the plaintiff to prove that the loss of, or injury to, goods was due to the carrier's negligence, proof that the goods were received by the carrier in good condition and delivered by it in bad condition establishes a prima facie case for plaintiff, which the carrier must overcome; and, when the defendant has adduced evidence to rebut the presumption, the burden of proof shifts to the plaintiff.

Although, where the action against a carrier for the loss of, or injury to, goods is based on the carrier's negligence, the burden is on plaintiff to prove

Delay causing damage

(1) Where plaintiff, suing for damages to shipments of fruit, claimed that the damaged condition was due to delay in shipment and rough and careless handling, it was essential to a recovery that he establish that the damage was due either to negligent delay in transportation or to violent injury to the fruit during transportation.—Bromberg v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 190 N.W. 955, 194 Iowa 1337.

(2) To establish delay, proof of the usual and ordinary time consumed in such transportation, together with proof that the carrier in the case at bar consumed greater time, was necessary.—Bromberg v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., supra.

Free carriage of employee's goods

In an action against a carrier for injury to the household goods of an employee of the carrier which are shipped without payment of freight charges, the fact that the car in which the goods were placed jumped the track does not raise a presumption of gross negligence, and the burden is on plaintiff to prove such negligence.—Tennessee & A. Emergency justifying change from express to freight service

In action against express company for loss from delay of shipment of car lot of milk and cream, evidence that the time actually consumed was at least three times the usual running time, that for most of the route the car was carried in freight trains, instead of by express service, etc, made out a prima facie case of negligence, casting the burden on defendant of showing that the delay arose from some other cause than its negligence, although the contract was made "subject to delay on account of congestion;" and it was

by the contract of shipment, plaintiff has assumed the burden of proof;[50] and this principle has been applied where it was sought to charge the carrier with liability as warehouseman.[51] It has been held, however, that, while the prima facie case so established must be met and overcome by the carrier, and this is often spoken of as the burden of proof, the burden of establishing the truth of the issue by a preponderance of the evidence does not shift, but remains with plaintiff.[52] If the shipper pleads specific acts of negligence, he cannot invoke the presumption arising from the receipt of goods in good condition and their arrival in bad condition.[53] Moreover, no presumption of negligence arises, and no duty is cast on the carrier to show its freedom from negligence, by proof that the goods were in bad condition when received from the carrier, in the absence of evidence that they were in good condition when delivered to it.[54] It has also been held that a prima case of negligence is not made out by mere proof of delay in an interstate shipment[55] or by proof of theft of the goods, without showing the surrounding circumstances;[56] and that the mere happening of a loss while the goods were in possession of the carrier does not raise a presumption of negligence under the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur.[57] On the other hand, it has been held that evidence that goods became water-soaked while in the carrier's possession makes a prima facie case against the carrier,[58] and that proof of delay in the transportation and delivery of perishable goods may be considered by the jury as prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the carrier, which it may rebut by proof that such delay was not caused by its negligence.[59] While nondelivery without excuse is at common law regarded as making a prima facie case of negligence, yet where it appears that the goods were stolen, and the circumstances do not authorize the inference of lack of reasonable care, plaintiff must go forward with the evidence and prove negligence.[60] Where the carrier has introduced evidence to rebut the presump-

If the jury are unable to determine whether the injury was due to the carrier's negligence or the inherent condition of the property, it should find for plaintiff, where the carrier has the burden of disproving negligence—Hurley v. Illinois Cent R Co, 282 S.W. 97, 221 Mo App 478.

tion raised by the failure to deliver the goods or their delivery in bad condition, the burden of proof shifts to plaintiff[61] who must then show that the carrier was in fact guilty of negligence causing or contributing to the loss.[62] The failure of plaintiff to show that goods delivered to the carrier were properly packed and marked by him makes it incumbent on him to prove that the carrier was negligent.[63]

To recover against a private carrier for loss of goods plaintiff must prove that the loss was due to the carrier's negligence.[64]

(3) Where Defense Is Based on Common-Law Exception

Some authorities place the burden of showing freedom from negligence on the carrier where it seeks to avoid liability because of a common-law or contract exception, while others hold that where a loss within an exception is shown, the burden is on plaintiff to prove negligence. Under a statute dispensing with notice of claim where the loss or injury was due to the carrier's negligence, plaintiff, failing to give notice, must show that the loss or injury was caused by the negligence of the carrier.

An issue may arise as to negligence and does arise where the carrier seeks to escape liability by reason of a common-law exception or one embodied in a valid contract; and in such case there is a conflict in the decisions on the burden of proof, as appears in the following notes.[65] According to some authorities, if the carrier seeks to escape liability by reason of a common-law or contract exception, the burden rests on it, not only to show that the loss or injury falls within such exception, as heretofore stated supra subdivisions h and i of this section, but also that it occurred without negligence on its part;[66] at least where the shipment is intra-state,[67] and this rule has been held applicable in case of loss by fire or flood, where that is a liability excepted in the contract.[68] Where the carrier, pursuant to such rule, makes out a prima facie case of exemption from liability, the burden is on plaintiff to prove lack of due care and reasonable diligence on defendant's part.[69]

On the other hand, the rule established by the federal courts, and in a number of the state courts, is that, where the carrier shows the loss to be within an excepted cause, either at common law or under a valid contract exemption, it is not bound to go further and explain the particulars of the loss or injury for the purpose of showing that it was free from negligence in connection therewith, but that the burden of proving negligence such as will render the carrier liable notwithstanding the common-law or contract exception, is on plaintiff,[70] and this

(3) Carrier claiming loss to shipment was caused by shipper or his agent, must negative contributory negligence.—Bugg v. Perry & Faircloth, supra.

Contract limitations of liability

When, under a bill of lading exempting the carrier from damage by fire or flood, a shipper shows that the goods were delivered to the carrier and that they were not delivered by it to the consignee, a prima facie case is made against the carrier, and the onus is cast on it to go forward with the evidence and to show that the damage or loss occurred from fire or flood excepted in the bill of lading and in addition to make out a prima facie case of diligence and freedom from fault or negligence on its part.—Central of Georgia Ry. Where a carrier shows that property was destroyed by act of God, a shipper has burden of proving that carrier's negligence contributed to loss as claimed.

rule would seem to be especially applicable where the contract is that the carrier shall not be liable except in case of negligence.[71]

The federal rule placing the burden of proving negligence on the shipper governs interstate shipments where the carrier is sued in a state court, regardless of the rule prevailing in that state with regard to intra-state shipments,[72] in the absence of a provision in the bill of lading as to the burden of proof.[73]

Want of notice of claim. Under the last provision of the Cummins amendment of the Interstate Commerce Act, providing that no notice of claim by the shipper shall be required where the loss or injury was due to the carelessness or negligence of the carrier, the burden is on a shipper who has not given notice of his claim within the required time, to prove that the loss or injury was due to the carrier's negligence.[74]

(1) Stock not accompanied by shipper

(1) Stock Not Accompanied by Shipper

Proof that live stock, not accompanied by a caretaker, was received by the carrier in good condition and delivered at destination in bad condition ordinarily casts on the carrier the burden of showing that a loss or injury was due to some cause which would exempt it from liability and was not the result of the negligence. The rule is subject to a number of exceptions and qualifications, as where recovery is sought for sickness, or death resulting from sickness, or where specific negligence is charged by plaintiff.

Subject to some exceptions and qualifications, it is a general rule that proof that live stock, not ac-

"The general rule . . . has its foundation in the fact that the subject matter of the transportation contract is committed to the exclusive possession of the carrier, and he alone is in position to know and to disclose the cause of injury thereto on transit. The shipper is wholly without such knowledge, and must submit to his loss unless the carrier be required by the law to explain the occasion thereof and to exonerate himself from blame."—Zimmerman v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co., 167 N.W. 546, 140 Minn. 212.

This presumption is not evidence and expires when sufficient evidence is introduced of the facts out of which the damage arises to support a finding that it was from a cause for which the carrier would not be liable.—Nye-Schneider-Fowler Co. v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 179 N.W. 503, 105 Neb. 151.

The Carmack amendment, 49 U.S.C.A. § 20, by reestablishing the common-law rule of liability on interstate shipments of live stock, relieved the carrier of liability as insurer, but a prima facie case is made by showing receipt of stock by carrier in good condition and delivery at destination in bad condition, and the negligence of the carrier is presumed when such prima facie case is made.—Panhandle & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Andrews, Tex.Civ.App., 278 S.W. 478.

Plaintiff need not prove what specific acts the carrier did or failed to do which resulted in the death of a hog in transit.—Buck v. American Railway Express Co., 192 N.W. 277, 109 Neb. 638.

Carrier may rebut presumption

Carrier by affirmative evidence may rebut presumption of negligence arising from delivery to it of cattle in good condition and delivery at destination of cattle in bad condition.—Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. East, Tex.Civ.App., 57 S.W.2d 175.

Sufficiency of evidence to overcome presumption

(1) Where death from natural causes of an animal in transit is pleaded as an excuse, the carrier must show that death was the result of natural causes, and that the disease was contracted through no fault of the carrier, and evidence of proper feeding and watering at certain points does not conclusively rebut the presumption of the carrier's negligence.—Ragsdale-Lawhon Mule & Horse Co. v. Davis, 119 S.E. 428, 30 Ga.App. 752.

(2) Presumption of negligence against a carrier from the arrival of a shipment of cattle, which had been unaccompanied, in an injured condition is rebutted by showing that there was no delay in handling the cattle and that they were transported without negligence.—Leon v. Hines, Tex.Civ.App., 223 S.W. 239.

(3) A shipper's prima facie case for loss of hogs in transit made by proof of delivery to a carrier in good condition and death of some of them when delivered by the carrier was not overcome by evidence that they died from congestion of the lungs, it not appearing that was the sole cause of death.—Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. Payne, App., 243 S.W. 357, certiorari quashed State ex rel. Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. Trimble, 250 S.W. 393, 298 Mo. 418.

(4) A prima facie showing of negligence of the carrier in action for damages to live stock shipped is not met by proof that the cattle when shipped were securely tied by the shipper, and while in the exclusive charge of the carrier became untied.—San Antonio & A. P. Ry. Co. v. Jackson & Allen, Tex.Civ.App., 187 S.W. 488.

(5) Train records and notations of no rough handling, made by the carrier's freight train conductor and confined to the breaking of, or damage to, some part of a car or the parting of the train, are of little pro-

in the bill of lading or contract of shipment relieving the carrier from liability for injury unless caused by its negligence,[76] or providing that the burden shall be on the shipper to prove that the carrier was negligent.[77] In some decisions the rule is laid down even more broadly, it being stated that proof that live stock delivered to the carrier was lost or injured while in its possession throws on the carrier the burden of showing that the loss or injury was not due to its negligence.[78]

Extent and qualifications of rule in general. While it is necessary, in order to raise the presumption of negligence on the part of the carrier, for plaintiff to show that the live stock was delivered to the carrier in good condition,[79] such rule does not apply where plaintiff charges specifically that the stock was damaged by some act of negligence done after its receipt by the carrier, such as exposure thereof to a storm.[80] There is no presumption against the carrier where it appears that the consignee, in receiving the shipment and paying the freight charges, executed a written receipt therefor as "in good order," and there was then no visible indication to the contrary;[81] and if the carrier proves that live stock was delivered to it for shipment in a damaged condition the burden is on plaintiff to show that the carrier was negligent.[82] Although plaintiff in a common-law action need not in the first instance prove negligence on the part of the carrier but may wait until the carrier pleads and proves facts tending to bring the loss or injury within one of the exceptions to a carrier's common law liability,[83] yet, where the carrier meets the burden of proving, or the evidence shows prima facie, that the loss or injury resulted from a cause excepted in the shipping contract, the burden is on plaintiff to prove that the carrier was negligent.[84] Also, in accordance with the rule already discussed in § 79 that the carrier is relieved from liability if he has provided suitable means of transportation and exercised that degree of care which the nature of the property requires, or has not otherwise contributed to the injury, if the carrier shows such facts he need not go further and make a specific showing that the injury was actually caused by one of excepted causes exempting him from liability.[85]

bative force to rebut the presumption of negligence arising from the unexplained injury to live stock in transit, since there might be much rough handling indicated by such records.—Daily v Chicago, St. P., M & O. R. Co., 194 N.W 676, 110 Neb. 481.

A Louisiana statute, Civ.Code art 2754, making carriers liable for loss or injury unless caused by accidental or uncontrollable events, does not render a railroad liable for death of a horse in transit because it fails to show the cause of death, where the horse is carried under bill of lading providing that railroad should not be liable for death unless caused by its negligence, as to which there was no evidence—McHenry Horse Exch. v. Different quantum of proof
"We think this apparent exception to the general rule is, in reality, only a recognition of the different quantum of evidence required to establish the same defense under different circumstances It is a well-known fact that the majority of inanimate objects, when they are delivered to the carrier in good condition, will almost invariably remain in the same state until they reach the consignee at the end of the route, in the absence of some human instrumentality which injures them. Such being the case, it is but reasonable that, in case such objects arrived in a damaged condition, the carrier should prove affirmatively the damage was caused by one of the

Showing loss or injury due to human agency. In some cases, even in jurisdictions where the general rule is approved, a qualification or limitation has been made to the effect that, inasmuch as the carrier is not liable for the death of animals during transportation due to natural causes or to their inherent vice or natural disposition, mere proof that the animals died while in the possession of the carrier is not sufficient to establish liability, but the evidence must further show that the loss was due to human agency,[86] after which showing the carrier has the burden of proving due diligence on its part.[87] No presumption of negligence, it has been held, arises against the carrier from mere injury as arises in the case of inanimate objects;[88] but where this view prevails it is said that the burden on plaintiff is sustained by very slight proof, and may be established by collateral circumstances affording a reasonable inference of negligence on the carrier's part.[89]

Where specific negligence is charged. Another exception to the general rule, as held in a number of cases, is that the presumption of negligence arising from the receipt of live stock by the carrier in good condition and the delivery thereof in bad condition, does not apply where plaintiff alleges specific acts or omissions as constituting negligence, instead of relying on the carrier's liability as insurer;[90] in such case plaintiff has the burden of proving negligence of the carrier causing or contributing to the damage,[91] and mere proof of injury in transit will not make a prima facie showing of negligence so as to cast on the carrier the burden of disproving negligence;[92] but, where plaintiff makes a prima facie showing of negligence, the burden is on the carrier to prove its freedom from negligence.[93]

Sickness of live stock. An important limitation on the general rule, recognized by some decisions, is four things above set forth, since they were the only matters which released it from the obligation of an insurer imposed on it by public policy. For instance, a plate glass mirror, which is in good condition, will remain so indefinitely unless injured by an act of God or some human violence applied thereto directly or indirectly. And, since the carrier is in the exclusive possession of the goods during their carriage, it is in the best position of any one to show affirmatively the real cause of the damage. It is apparent, however, that animate objects, such as livestock, are in an entirely different category They may be injured, or even killed, by acts arising out of their own inherent nature and unaccompanied by any human agency or negligence. Even with the best of care on the part of all who come in contact with them during the shipment, they often fail to arrive at their destination in good condition. The apparent exception is merely a recognition of this fact, and, if the carrier proves the exercise of due care on its part, the natural presumption is that the damage was caused by the nature of the animals, and not by any human agency."—Southern Pac. Co. v. Itule, Ariz, 74 P.2d 38, 41.

Evidence sufficient to put burden on carrier

(1) Evidence of failure to sand floors of cattle car and of violent jerking was held sufficient to place burden on carrier of showing freedom from negligence—Murray v Southern Pac. Co., 265 P. 337, 89 Cal. App. 741.

(2) In an action to recover damages for injury to a horse which was being carried in a railroad car, that proof that the injury was occasioned by a sudden stopping of the car, so violent that a wooden bar in front of the horse was broken in two, and two halters secured to the top of the car were snapped, and the horse was thrown down and his back broken, and that employees of the company at once entered the car to see if injury had been done, raises a presumption of negligence on the part of the company.—Newman v Pennsylvania R. Co, 53 N.Y.S. 456, 33 App Div. 171, 27 N.Y.Civ Proc 377

In Missouri, under L.1913 p 177, proof of carrier's failure to transport live stock within a reasonable time is prima facie proof of negligence, and the burden is then on the carrier to show that its failure was not due to its negligence; but this statute does not apply to interstate shipments, and in such cases the burden is on plaintiff not only to show delay, but to show a negligent delay—Cunningham v. Chicago & A R Co., App., 215 S.W. 5—Berry v Chicago & A. R. Co., App., 208 S W 622—Baker v. Bush, App., 194 S W. 1061.

that where a recovery is sought for the sickness of live stock in transit, or from death resulting from sickness the fact that the stock was apparently sound when delivered for shipment raises no presumption of negligence, but the burden is on plaintiff to prove the carrier's negligence,[94] and that such negligence was the proximate cause of the damage,[95] the reason for this exception to the general rule being that sickness of live stock, or death from sickness, may be due to a diseased condition existing at the time of or prior to its delivery to the carrier, although not discovered by its owner or the carrier, or may be due to atmospheric, climatic, or other conditions over which the carrier has no control, and for which it would not be responsible.[96] So, where plaintiff averred failure of the carrier to furnish clean cars, as required by a rule of the state sanitary stock commission, whereby live stock became sick and died, and the carrier charged that the stock became infected before the shipment began, the burden is on plaintiff to prove his averment.[97]

Effect of provisions in bill of lading. Where a shipping contract stipulates that, as a condition precedent to recovery for loss of, or injury to, animals shipped, the shipper must prove that the loss or injury was due to the carrier's negligence, the burden is on the shipper, and the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur does not apply;[98] but, where the carrier departs from the agreed route, it has the burden of proving, notwithstanding such stipulation, not only due care on its part, but also that the loss or injury was not due to the change of route.[99] So, although the contract places on the shipper the burden of proving negligence, where there is an unreasonable delay sufficient to raise an inference of negligence on the part of the carrier, the burden shifts to the carrier to show that the delay was beyond its control.[1]

(2) Stock Accompanied by Shipper

It is a general rule, with some exceptions and qualifications, that where the owner undertakes to accompany live stock for the purpose of caring therefor, the burden is on him to show that loss of, or injury to, the stock was due to the carrier's negligence. Ordinarily the burden is on a shipper accompanying live stock to show that loss of, or injury to, the stock was not caused by his negligence.

Although there is some authority to the contrary,[2] the general rule is that, where by special agreement the owner of stock or his agent accompanies the shipment for the purpose of giving care and attention to the stock, the burden is on the owner, in an action for damages for loss or injury alleged to be due to the negligence of the carrier, to prove that the loss or injury was the result of the carrier's negligence, either in transporting the stock or in failing to afford facilities for caring therefor,[3] in

Extent of burden
Shipper accompanying shipment had to establish that he could not observe car containing horses at place where injuries occurred before burden shifted to carrier to show lack of negligence.—Cooper v. Oregon Short Line R. Co., 262 P. 873, 45 Idaho 313.

the absence of a statute to the contrary;[4] there being no presumption of negligence from the fact that live stock was in good condition when shipped and in bad condition at destination, or from mere proof of injury.[5] The reason for this is that the shipper is in as good a position as the carrier to know what was the cause of the loss or injury and whether such loss or injury was the result of the carrier's negligence.[6] The burden of showing the reasonableness of a demand by the shipper that live stock which had become unmanageable be unloaded at an intermediate point is on plaintiff.[7]

Extent and qualifications of rule. The rule placing the burden on the owner accompanying the stock to prove the carrier's negligence obtains where the consignor agreed to accompany the shipment, but failed to do so,[8] although it has been held otherwise where the carrier knew that he was not accompanying the shipment pursuant to his agreement.[9] The fact that the owner accompanying the shipment was not negligent does not operate to relieve him of the burden of proving that the injury to the stock was due to the carrier's negligence.[10] So it has been held that a statute which requires carriers to furnish shippers of live stock free transportation to and from destination does not alter the rule that no presumption of the carrier's negligence arises from the injury of live stock in transportation, where in accordance with the shipping contract the shipper accompanies the shipment.[11] Nevertheless it has been held that the mere fact that the shipper accompanies the shipment will not place on him the burden of proving negligence on the part of the carrier where there is no proof that he assumed the duty of taking care of the stock shipped,[12] the presumption, in such case being that the carrier accepted the shipment under its full common-law liability for the safe transportation thereof, so as to place on it the burden of showing freedom from negligence.[13] Moreover, where injury to cattle is caused by delay in transportation it is not to be presumed that the caretaker, concerned with the duty of keeping the cattle on their feet and preventing unnecessary damage thereto, would be charged with notice of the reasons for the various delays, and be required to show that such delays were negligent, since unexplained and unusual delays in transporting cattle would raise a presumption, or make a prima facie case, of negligence on the part of the carrier,[14] casting on it the burden of proving a legal excuse.[15] If the presence of a caretaker, or his acts or conduct, prevented the carrier from in any manner discharging its duties as a common carrier, the burden of proving such matters, it has been held, is on the carrier.[16] The general rule placing the burden of proof on a shipper accompanying the live stock has no application where the shipper is not afforded an opportunity to accompany the stock;[17] nor is the rule applicable where the loss or injury was not caused by the shipper's failure to perform his agreement to care

4. Statutory provisions

Under Code Suppl 1913 § 2116, as amended, declaring that, in an action against a railroad corporation to enforce rights under the statute, the burden of proving that the statute has been complied with by the railroad corporation shall be on such corporation, the fact that the shipper accompanies the stock does not relieve the carrier of the burden of proof—Mackin v. Statement of rule

Where a shipment of live stock is made under a special contract providing that the shipper will care for the animals and attend to feeding and watering them, and the carrier is aware that the shipper is not accompanying the animals to care for them and undertakes to feed and water them, the special contract does not change the general rule that proof of delivery to carrier in good condition and delivery by the carrier at destination in bad condition makes a prima facie case of negligence and the burden is on defendant to overcome such prima facie case—Chicago, R. for the stock, and the presumption of the carrier's negligence arising from proof of loss or injury of stock while in the carrier's control is not affected by an agreement that plaintiff, given free transportation, agreed to care for the stock, where the damage was not caused by his failure to perform his agreement, especially where for a time during the transportation plaintiff was not in attendance on the stock, which was during such period in the complete control and custody of the carrier.[18] It has also been held that the doctrine that, where a caretaker accompanies a live stock shipment, no presumption obtains, in the absence of proof of how the injury to the stock occurred that it was due to the carrier's negligence, does not apply where the attendant shows that there was rough handling of the stock and an inexcusable delay in transit, from which a presumption of injury therefrom arises, and the carrier offers no evidence to contravene such presumption,[19] and that, where the carrier violates a provision of a statute prescribing the length of time that live stock may be confined without unloading, feeding, and watering, a presumption of negligence on the part of the carrier arises, casting on it the burden of showing a legal excuse for such violation.[20] On the same principle, where the carrier fails to comply with the contract of shipment requiring live stock to be unloaded, fed, and watered after a specified period of confinement, the carrier has the burden of proving that it was not negligent in this respect.[21]

Burden of showing absence of negligence of caretaker. Where by agreement the shipper accompanies the stock for the purpose of taking care of it during transportation, the burden is on him in an action for loss or injury to show that such loss or injury was not due to any negligence on his part in the performance of the duties assumed by him,[22] since he assumes duties as fully and explicitly as does the carrier;[23] but where the shipper shows the performance of the things he undertook to do and that the stock was not injured by anything he was to do or did, and that it was delivered in bad condition on reaching the point of destination, the inference that the injury was the result of the carrier's negligence is justified, and the carrier must meet such case by evidence.[24]

1. Damages

The burden is on the plaintiff to prove the amount and extent of damages, but where the defendant alleges a stipulation fixing the market value of the property at the time and place of shipment, and the plaintiff establishes a different market value, the burden is on the defendant to show the correct value. The burden is also on the defendant to prove matters in reduction of damages.

In an action for the loss of, or injury to, property while in the possession of a carrier for transportation, the burden is on plaintiff to prove not only that damages resulted from the loss or injury,[25] but also to show, with reasonable certainty,[26] the amount and extent of such damages,[27] and his failure to establish the measure of damages is fatal to a recovery.[28] So, where the damage is partial only, the burden is on plaintiff to present evidence

Burden not sustained

In action against carrier for loss of baled cotton by fire, plaintiff had the burden of showing the amount of his damage, which was not discharged by evidence failing to show the grade of the cotton or number of pounds destroyed—Brass v. Shrinkage in weight of grain

In an action against a carrier for loss of grain shipped, where evidence is introduced to show that grain would shrink in weight during shipment, owing to loss of moisture content, mere discrepancy in weight before and after shipment cannot be relied on alone to prove actual loss, and the burden of showing the shrinkage and of making allowance therefor is on the shipper—Nye-Schneider-Fowler Co. v Chicago & N W Ry. Co., 182 N W. 967, 106 Neb. 149

Loss in weight of live stock

Where loss in weight of live stock is claimed as a result of delay in starting a shipment which arrived at its destination within a reasonable time after loading, the burden is upon the shipper to show that upon its arrival it weighed less than it would have weighed if the delay had not occurred.—Gray v Oregon Short Line R. Co, 187 P. 540, 32 Idaho 701.

from which the exact amount of damages may, with reasonable certainty, be determined.[29]

As affecting the damages recoverable for the loss of or injury to property, the burden of proof is on plaintiff to show the value of the goods;[30] and, if the action is based on contractual liability, this principle applies whether the contract is considered as fixing the measure of damages or as limiting defendant's liability.[31] Under the Interstate Commerce Act providing that the value of interstate shipments declared by the shipper shall have no other effect than to limit liability and recovery to an amount not exceeding the value so declared, the burden is on the shipper suing for loss or injury to prove the true value of the goods, since the carrier is not bound by the declared value.[32] Where defendant sets up as a defense a stipulation fixing the market value of the property at the place and time of shipment, and plaintiff establishes a market value not in accordance with the stipulation, the burden is on defendant to show the correct one if prejudiced by plaintiff's estimate.[33] The rule has been laid down that goods are presumed to be worth as much or more at the place of destination as at the point of shipment, until the presumption is rebutted by proof.[34] Where it appears that most of the damage was done before the act of negligence by the company on which the claim for recovery is based, plaintiff must show what injury, if any, resulted after the act.[35]

Special damages. The burden is on plaintiff to prove special damages sought to be recovered,[36] and to show that such damages were contemplated by the carrier when the property was received for shipment.[37] If plaintiff seeks to recover as damages an amount alleged to have been expended for medicines and the care of injured live stock, he has the burden of establishing that such amount was reasonable and necessary.[38]

Reduction of damages; avoidable consequences. The burden is on the carrier to show that the consequences of the injury could have been avoided or the amount of damages reduced by the exercise of proper care on plaintiff's part.[39] The carrier also has the burden of establishing any offset which it claims against the damage to the property.[40]

Plaintiff's negligence enhancing damages

Illinois Cent. R. Co., 282 S.W. 97, 221 Mo.App. 478.

Damage to perishable articles

(1) Where the carrier claims that plaintiff, in order to mitigate the damages to a shipment of melons, was required to accept the melons, unload them, and in that way ascertain the number actually injured, the burden was on the carrier to show how such action by plaintiff would mitigate the damages.—Perkel v. (2) In action against railroad for injuries to grapes in transit wherein plaintiff showed that damaged grapes were disposed of by auction sale on railroad company's piers at place of destination in accordance with usage and custom of trade, railroad had burden of going forward with proof to show that disposition of damaged grapes in some other manner would have mitigated plaintiff's damages.—Schwalb v. Where the carrier asserts as a defense that plaintiff had agreed to insure the goods against theft in consideration of lower rates for transportation, and had collected the insurance for the goods stolen, the burden of proving such defense is on the carrier.[41]

m. Miscellaneous Issues

The general rules affecting presumptions and burden of proof have been applied to various issues, other than those heretofore discussed, arising in actions against carriers for the loss of, or injury to, goods delivered to the carrier for transportation.

In an action under the Carmack amendment for loss of, or injury to, property transported from a point in one state to a point in another, it is presumed that a bill of lading was issued as the statute requires.[42] Where the petition alleges a contract for shipment, which contract is apparently valid, the burden of proving that the contract is in violation of the Interstate Commerce Law is on the carrier.[43] On the other hand, where the carrier alleges that cotton, which was burned while on its platform, was placed there by plaintiff in violation of a rule of the carrier, and plaintiff alleges that the rule had been waived, the burden is on him to prove such waiver.[44] In an action by the shippers of live stock for damage from breach of an express provision of the contract of carriage that the stock should not be unloaded at a certain point, it was incumbent on plaintiffs to prove that the contract contained the stipulation regarding unloading.[45] When a shipping contract recites that the shipper examined the car in which the stock was to be transported and found it safe and suitable for the intended purposes, the burden is on him to show that it was unsafe,[46] and that a defect alleged to have caused the injury was not patent when he examined the car.[47] In an action against an express company for the loss of goods, defended on the ground that the person receipting for the goods and wearing a cap and badge of the company was not its agent, the burden is on plaintiff to prove that such person was the company's agent.[48] The burden of proving an emergency justifying deviation is on the carrier.[49] The carrier also has the burden of proving that a loss, for which it would not have become liable except for a deviation, would have occurred had there been no deviation.[50] Where plaintiff relies on notice given by him to the carrier to divert a shipment, the burden is on him in an action for loss of the goods to prove that such notice was received by the carrier before delivery was completed.[51]

a. In General

The general rules as to the admissibility of evidence are applicable in actions against carrier for loss of, or injury to, property delivered to it for transportation.

In an action against a carrier for loss of, or injury to, goods, any evidence which is relevant and material to prove or disprove a particular issue is admissible, if competent under the general rules of evidence,[52] and, conversely, evidence which is ir-

Schedules and rules of carrier
In suit for damage to interstate shipment, certified copy of carrier's schedules and rules as filed with interstate commerce commission, was admissible as against claim bill of lading controlled.—Breazeale v. American Ry. Exp. Co., 137 So. 585, 18 La.App. 59.

relevant or immaterial,[53] or which from its nature is incompetent under the general rules,[54] is inadmissible. In a suit against a carrier for loss of freight in a car loaded by plaintiff, but the keys thereof retained by agents of the company, it is not error to exclude evidence that it was the custom of the carrier not to be responsible for the conduct of its agents who held the keys, particularly if there was no notice of such custom brought home to plaintiff.[55] When the manner in which plaintiff's goods were loaded is shown by positive testimony, evidence as to the manner in which similar goods were usually loaded is inadmissible.[56]

b. Right of Action

Subject to the general rules of evidence, plaintiff may show that he is the owner of the goods lost or injured.

In an action for loss of or injury to goods in possession of a carrier, plaintiff consignor may show that he, and not the consignee, is the owner of the goods[57] and this may be proved by parol,[58] but, where in such action plaintiff produces a bill of lading, this constitutes an admission that the undertaking of the carrier is in writing, and parol proof that the goods were shipped by the shipper named therein as plaintiff's agent is inadmissible,[59] nor can plaintiff testify to the contents of the bill of lading in order to show that he was the owner, the bill not having been produced and no notice having been given to defendant to produce it.[60]

c. Contract of Shipment

Evidence which is relevant and material as to the existence and terms of the contract of shipment is admissible, and the contract itself may be admitted, provided it was signed by the plaintiff, or it may be proved by circumstantial evidence.

The published rules of the carrier, or the contract under which a service on its part is to be performed, are admissible in an action against the carrier for negligently failing to perform such service,[61] and the bill of lading, waybill, or receipt, evidencing such contract, is competent to prove that the goods described therein were delivered to the carrier for shipment, as stated infra subdivision d of this section. Where an action against a carrier for negligence was based on a written contract of carriage, and defendant alleged failure of plaintiff to comply with its terms, defendant was entitled to have the contract put in evidence and construed by the court, and it was error to exclude it,[62] but a contract not signed by plaintiff or his agent is properly excluded.[63] In an action for injury to a shipment, the contract of shipment may be proved by circumstantial evidence;[64] but, in an action for breach of a contract of carriage resulting in loss of the goods shipped, evidence that it was impracticable to carry such goods on ordinary cars was not admissible to show that such a contract was not made.[65] The bill of lading is the best evidence of

(1) In an action by consignee against carrier for loss of goods shipped, evidence of the receipt of shipments other than the one sued on, and what was done with them, was properly excluded as being irrelevant.—American Ry. Express Co. v. Stanley, 92 So. 642, 207 Ala. 355

(2) In action for damages to cattle in shipment, exclusion of conductor's reply to question whether any other claims were "put in at Fort Worth" for damages to cattle in other cars on same train was not error, in absence of showing that Fort Worth was place where claims, if any, would have been made.—St. Louis Southwestern Ry. Co. of Texas v. Hill Bros., Tex.Civ.App., 80 S.W. 2d 432.

Existence of insurance

In an action against a railroad company for destruction of a carload of household goods and merchandise, by fire alleged to have been caused by sparks from a passing locomotive, evidence that plaintiff had or thought he had considerable insurance on the property destroyed was improperly admitted, in the absence of any evidence indicating that plaintiff set the car on fire, or that he did not use reasonable diligence in extinguishing the fire.—Mount v. the contract of shipment.[66] In an action for injuries to a shipment of horses, an objection to a question, inquiring of the conductor whether any "exceptions" were noted on the bill of lading when the horses were turned over to him was properly sustained, since an answer to the question, if affirmative, would have been incompetent, as hearsay, and, if negative, would have shown nothing as to the condition of the horses on delivery to the consignee or as to how they were injured.[67] Where the form in a bill of lading to be filled out in case a caretaker accompanied the stock was not filled out, but the bill had a pencil notation "caretaker to W.," it was competent for the shipper to testify that he did not state to the carrier that he would accompany the stock, and did not know how the notation got on the bill.[68]

d. Delivery to, and Acceptance by, Carrier

Delivery of the goods to and acceptance of the carrier may be proved or disproved by any competent evidence, such as bills of lading or shipping receipts. The custom of the carrier with respect to the receipt of goods for immediate shipment may be shown.

Any competent evidence, relevant and material to prove or disprove the delivery and acceptance of the property to the carrier for transportation, is admissible.[69] Bills of lading, waybills, or shipping receipts are competent evidence to prove delivery for shipment of the articles therein described;[70] and, while it is not necessary to introduce the bill of lading when the action is for negligence in failing to deliver goods, and not in contract, the bill may nevertheless be received in evidence to show how the goods came into the carrier's possession.[71] A letter written by the carrier's agent after the destruction of the goods by fire stating that the carrier would not assume further responsibility for the freight is admissible to show knowledge on the part of the agent that the goods had been delivered for shipment.[72] So it has been held that, where goods delivered for immediate shipment have been lost by fire, evidence of the carrier's custom with respect to receipt of goods for immediate shipment is admissible.[73]

e. Condition and Identity of Property

Evidence is ordinarily admissible to show the condition of the property when received by the carrier, or upon arrival at destination; and, for the purpose of showing the true condition and extent of injury, evidence of the condition of the property when sold subsequent to its arrival has been admitted.

In an action for injury to property in transit, evidence is admissible to show the condition of the property at the time it was received by the carrier,[74] as to its condition before delivery by the

69. To show delivery
(1) Testimony of an officer of the carrier that the goods had been in the carrier's possession is admissible to show delivery to the carrier.—Harnett v. Westcott, 3 N.Y.S. 7, 56 N.Y. Super. 213.

(2) In action for damages to two cars of onions, evidence was admissible that while the two carloads had been taken up in first place by one of the terminal railroad associations of the city of shipment, such association was in fact acting for defendant railroad, and that that was the usual practice between the plaintiff and defendant and the association.—Jones v. Toledo, St. L. & W. R. Co., Mo. App., 202 S.W. 433.

To show acceptance
(1) Statements made by carrier's agent to the shipper's authorized agent, as to an order of the carrier not to place cotton, subsequently destroyed by fire, on the carrier's platform unless for immediate shipment were admissible on the issue of acceptance by the carrier.—W. F. Bogart & Co. v. Wade, 200 S.W. 148, 132 Ark. 49.

(2) Where, as bearing on the question whether a railroad company had received cotton for transportation as a common carrier, and as confirmatory of the statement of an agent that it had not, defendant offered to ask the agent whether it was not the custom to weigh and mark goods as they were taken for transportation, the goods in question not having been weighed and marked, it was held that the evidence was admissible.—Vaughan v. Raleigh, etc., R. Co., 63 N.C. 11.

(3) In shipper's action against railroad for loss of potatoes defended on ground that railroad had not accepted the shipment in any capacity, evidence that a certain transportation company with which barge owners had a working agreement was a participating carrier was not admissible, having no bearing on the issue of whether the defendant had accepted the shipment.—American Fruit Growers v. King, 114 S.E. 861, 122 S.C. 69.

Evidence of good condition
(1) In action for injury to potatoes in shipment, testimony of witness that potatoes when loaded were not diseased was relevant and competent.—C. M. McMahen & Sons v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 106 So. 56, 21 Ala. App. 66, certiorari denied Ex parte C. M. McMahen & Sons, 106 So. 57, 213 Ala. 642.

(2) Evidence that shipment was accepted by carrier's employee held admissible to show good condition and proper loading when delivered to carrier.—St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co. v. Glow Electric Co., 172 N.E. 425, 35 Ohio App. 291.

Evidence of bad condition
Where a carrier receiving for shipment a crop of rice, part of which was owned by the landlord of the land on which it was raised, and part carrier,[75] and as to its condition after arrival at destination, up to the time of delivery to the consignee;[76] but it is error to allow a witness who has not properly identified the goods to testify as to their bad condition at the time of shipment,[77] or to permit a witness who, although he had helped in the loading of fruit into a car, did not see the fruit picked, sorted, or packed, nor examine the same when it was being loaded, to testify to the condition of the fruit when shipped.[78] Evidence that the property, on being returned to the point of shipment after the buyer's refusal to accept it, was in the same condition as when first shipped, is relevant on the issue as to its condition at the time of the first shipment.[79] Where the carrier claims that live stock was in such poor condition that it could not endure transportation, evidence that the stock was in better condition when shipped than it was when brought from another point to the point of shipment is admissible.[80]

The condition of the property may be shown by evidence of an examination of part of the shipment where a thorough inspection of the entire shipment was impracticable.[81] To establish that injuries to live stock were received in transit, it is competent to show the condition of the stock when it reached its destination, and that some of the stock died after arrival.[82] So it has been held that evidence of the condition of live stock at the time of their sale subsequent to arrival at destination was admissible as tending to show the true condition of the stock and the extent of the injury to it at the time of its arrival.[83] Where goods were delivered by the carrier to the consignee, who thereafter made sales thereof from the railroad car, evidence as to the condition of the goods at the time of such sales is inadmissible.[84] Where the carrier claims that the shipper misrepresented the contents of a box of goods, evidence as to its contents is admissible.[85] So, where it is claimed that some of the goods in a box were lost, and others injured, in transit, it is competent to show what goods were in the box when it was shipped, and when it was delivered, and for that purpose to show the weight of the box at the beginning and end of the transportation.[86]

f. Negligence of Carrier in General

(1) Inanimate freight
(2) Live stock

(1) Inanimate Freight

The admissibility of evidence as to the carrier's negligence in the transportation of goods is governed by the general rules of evidence.

The general rules of evidence, particularly those governing proof of negligence generally, are applicable in an action against a carrier for loss of, or injury to, goods, to prove or disprove negligence on the part of the carrier,[87] and this applies to is-by the tenant, is sued by the landlord for injury to his part, and the carrier claims that the injury was caused by the rice getting wet while being harvested, and not by the manner in which it was handled in transit, the testimony of a witness who at destination had examined and graded the tenant's part of the crop, which was harvested and warehoused under substantially the same conditions, that it was in bad condition when received by the carrier, was admissible as tending to show that the landlord's part was also in bad condition at the time of shipment—Gulf Coast Transp Co v. Standard Milling Co., Tex.Com App, 252 S.W. 751, reversing, Civ.App., 197 S W 874.

Injury occurring after goods unloaded

In an action for damage to merchandise after it had been unloaded from the cars, and after the consignee had been notified that it was exposed and could not be stored, evidence for defendants that the consignee was usually notified, on the arrival of merchandise for him, that it could not be stored and must be immediately removed is admissible, as bearing both on defendant's negligence and on the reasonableness of sues as to whether the cars furnished were defective,[88] or were properly equipped and kept in condition for transporting perishable property,[89] whether the goods were properly loaded,[90] and whether the car or other vehicle was properly handled during transportation.[91] The fact that the shipper places a small value on his property is admissible on the question of its true value, and to show whether the methods of care adopted by the carrier were adequate in view of such valuation.[92] While negligence is not the gist of an action based on the carrier's breach of contract to carry safely, nevertheless evidence of the carrier's freedom from negligence in transporting perishable articles is admissible as tending to show that the damage to such articles was due to their own inherent tendencies[93]

In an action for damages to meat, the carrier, to prove that the meat spoiled from inherent defects or improper preparation, may introduce direct or circumstantial evidence tending to eliminate every other cause,[94] and under the Carmack amendment providing that a carrier shall be liable for any loss caused by it, the carrier may show that a loss of grain was due to shrinkage from natural causes[95]

Loss or injury from fire or flood. Evidence is admissible to show whether proper precautions were taken by the carrier to guard against and control fires.[96] Where the carrier defends an action for loss of household goods on the ground that the a delay on the part of the consignee in removing the goods.—Stowe v New York, etc., R Co, 113 Mass. 521.

Skill or caution of conductor

Where a claim for damages for loss of goods shipped is not predicated on want of skill or caution on the part of the conductor of the train on which the goods were shipped, evidence to show his caution and skill is not admissible.—Montgomery, etc., R. Co. v. Edmonds, 41 Ala. 667.

Negligence of private carrier

Where goods were stolen while the truck in which they were being hauled was left standing in front of a restaurant into which the driver had gone for lunch, the jury had a right to consider the value of the goods, the length of the haul, the character of the neighborhood where the theft occurred, and all the facts and circumstances bearing on the question of ordinary care.—Langendorf Clothing Co. v. Fara, 272 Ill App. 160.

Precautions against apprehended riots

In an action for loss of shipment destroyed by fire in consequence of a race riot, where plaintiff introduced proof of the conduct and declarations of the rioters as evidence of the situation then existing and also newspaper publications indicating the notoriety of the affair as evidence of notice to defendant's agents of incendiarism, it was not error to admit proof of a meeting of citizens and militia officers to show what steps were being taken to preserve public peace as affecting defendant's duty in the matter of precautions against apprehended danger.—Julius Kessler & Co v Southern Ry. Co in Kentucky, 255 S W. 535, 200 Ky. 713.

Precautions against collision

In an action for loss of goods caused by a collision, evidence may be introduced as to contrivances employed by other carriers to prevent similar accidents and to show that such contrivances were not in use by defendant.—Boscowitz v. Adams Express Co., 93 Ill 523, 34 Am.R. 191

Pennsylvania R Co., 83 F.2d 581, 65 App D.C 324.

Custom of carrier as to re-icing

The carrier may show a custom on its part, known to the shipper, not to re-ice cars unless so ordered by the shipper—House v. Wheelock, 254 Ill App. 149

Injury from freezing

In action against carrier for damages from freezing of a beverage, evidence that car used was of kind usually employed for carriage of perishable freight in the winter, and the best known vehicle for that purpose, was admissible.—Michellod v. Oregon-Washington R. & Nav. Co., 168 P. 620, 86 Or. 329.

Unventilated car

In an action for injuries to peanuts which plaintiff claimed resulted from unventilated car, evidence that green peanuts, if confined before sufficiently dry, would necessarily be damaged is admissible.—Cleburne Peanut & Products Co v. Employment of watchmen

On the issue as to the negligence of a railroad company in failing to employ a sufficient number of watchmen to guard against fire goods piled on its wharf, evidence as to the existence, at the time, of labor disturbances relating to men employed on ships loading at such wharf was competent.—Texas & P. R. Co. v. Coutourie, N.Y., 135 F. 465, 68 C.C.A. 177.

Facilities provided by city

If the question of defendant's negligence in failing to control a fire which started in its yards is raised, evidence as to the facilities provided flood causing the loss was unprecedented, evidence for plaintiff that, according to the history of the stream, the flood in question was not unprecedented was admissible.[97] In an action for the destruction of goods by fire from a car of unslaked lime fired in the carrier's yards by a flood, a rule of the American Railway Association and a regulation of the interstate commerce commission as to the transportation of unslaked lime, known to the carrier's agents, were admissible.[98]

Predictions of the weather forecaster, and knowledge of the carrier's agent as to previous floods, were admissible on the question of the carrier's negligence with relation to a fire caused by a flood.[99] On the other hand, it has been held that in an action for loss of goods from an unprecedented flood, evidence that a weather observer had issued a flood warning for a rise in a river which would not have endangered the cars, and that he had issued a warning of a higher rise, without a showing of the facts on which the prediction was made, or that it was brought to the carrier's knowledge, was inadmissible to show the carrier's negligence.[1] So a newspaper article based on the weather observer's forecast, not shown to have been read by the carrier's agent, has been held inadmissible.[2]

Other shipments. If the injuries are alleged to have been caused by neglect to ice cars properly, evidence that other cars shipped in the same way just before and just after the injured shipment arrived in good condition is irrelevant and inadmissible.[3] So where goods are lost from the carrier's depot after transportation, proof that other freight of the same kind was always cared for by it in the same manner, and that none had ever been lost is immaterial.[4]

(2) Live Stock

The general rules apply to the admissibility of evidence on the issue of the carrier's negligence in transporting live stock. Evidence as to matters relating to other shipments is admissible when, and only when, conditions are similar. Customary methods of performing the carrier's duties may be shown.

The general rules of evidence govern the admissibility of evidence in an action against a carrier for loss of, or injury to, live stock, to prove or disprove negligence on the part of the carrier,[5] as in furnishing defective or improperly equipped cars[6] or cat-

by the city for extinguishing such fires is properly admitted.—Peerless Mfg. Co v New York, etc, R Co, 61 A 511, 73 N H. 328

Notice that shipper was not accompanying stock

In an action against an express company for damage to a shipment of horses, testimony of plaintiff that when he arrived on the train with the horses at a point in Iowa he was informed by a stranger, who told him he was agent of the express company in charge of another car, that he could not ride to Chicago on the train with the horses, etc., was admissible to show plaintiff did not accompany the stock; and to impart notice of that fact to the express company—Gibson v Adams Express Co., 175 N W 331, 187 Iowa 1259.

Rough handling and jolting

In an action for damages to a shipment of cattle, where it appeared that during transportation some of the cows calved prematurely, evidence as to whether rough handling and jolting during transit would cause such calving, in view of evidence upon which the jury might find rough handling and jolting, is admissible to prove a cause for calving—Greening v Chicago & N W. Ry. Co, Mo App., 183 S.W. 1121

Loss or injury due to inherent propensities

(1) Evidence that the cattle were wild, and, when confined in a car, became frightened when other trains passed, and crowded into one end of the car, throwing each other down on the floor, was admissible to sustain the carrier's defense that the injury to the cattle was due to their natural propensities—Texas & N O. R. Co. v Conn, Tex Civ.App., 30 S W 2d 939.

(2) In an action for the loss of an animal which escaped after completion of the transportation, evidence which would tend to show that the escape was not due to the inherent viciousness of the animal is competent.—Deake v. U S Express Co, 138 N W. 196, 172 Mich. 451

The character and extent of the injuries are properly to be considered by the jury in deciding whether those in charge of the train had been guilty of negligence.—Louisville, etc, R Co v Lockman, 9 Ky Op 817.

Where the injuries result from infection

(1) It may be shown by those in a position to observe the physical surroundings that the car containing plaintiff's stock could have been moved to and from the point of destination without being first switched into the infected district.—Council v. St Louis, etc, R Co, 100 S W. 57, 123 Mo App 432.

Death of cattle subsequent to arrival

tle pens or railroad yards,[7] failing to perform its duties as to providing food, water, and rest for the stock,[8] negligently managing cars or trains,[9] failing to unload upon the arrival of the stock at destination,[10] or failing to provide suitable facilities for unloading.[11] Where an animal dies after completion of the transportation, it is competent, in order to show negligence on the part of the carrier, to prove that it had agreed to notify the consignee of the arrival of the animal, which it failed to do, and that by reason of such default the animal died.[12]

Conversations between the shipper and an authorized agent or employee of the carrier are admissible if relevant to the issue of the carrier's negligence;[13] but conversations with persons not shown to be employees of the carrier or authorized to represent it are inadmissible.[14] As tending to prove negligence causing injury to plaintiff's live stock,

Agreement to furnish particular kind of car

In an action for the loss of plaintiff's race horses during shipment by express, where the negligence relied on was the furnishing of an insecure wooden car which was demolished in a wreck, evidence of the carrier's agreement to furnish a different kind of car was pertinent to the question of negligence.—Adams Express Co. v. Darden, C.C.A.Tenn., 286 F. 61, affirmed 44 S.Ct. 502, 265 U.S. 265, 68 L.Ed 1010.

Acts of carrier after injury

In an action for the death of animals smothered in an ordinary express car, evidence that after complaint was made by the shipper the carrier began to use another kind of a car for like shipments is not admissible.—Wells v. Mitchell, Tex.Civ.App., 139 S.W. 926.

Ice in cattle yard

In an action for damages for rough handling of cattle, evidence as to ice on the ground in a cattle yard was admissible as bearing on the charge that they were driven from the yards into the cars with vicious dogs, it appearing that while being so dogged the cattle went on the ice and slipped and fell.—Rogness v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co., 196 P. 989, 59 Mont. 373.

Escape of animals before loading

If the injuries charged are due to the escape of the animals before loading because of defects in the carrier's pens, evidence of due care in transportation is irrelevant and inadmissible.—Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Thompson, 139 S.W. 939, 144 Ky. 765.

Conditions subsequently existing

A shipper, suing for injury to live stock, may show conditions of carrier's cattle pens several months after his cattle were detained there, the pens being permanent.—Bush v. Altschul, 193 S.W. 280, 128 Ark. 103.

8. Iowa.—Bateham v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 192 N.W. 818, 195 Iowa 659.

Evidence admissible

If the injuries are alleged to have been caused by failure to feed and water, the admission of evidence that the stock was injured by drinking too much water at a certain station was proper, there being other evidence that this was caused by a failure properly to feed and water before arrival at that station.—Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Dunn, Tex.Civ.App., 78 S.W. 1080.

Admissibility of shipping contract

In an action against a railway for failing to water cattle before dipping them, although plaintiff contends that the contract for dipping was an independent oral contract, exclusion of the shipping contract set up as a defense is error.—Missouri, K. & T. Ry. Co. v. Skinner, 160 P. 875, 61 Okl. 189.

Request by shipper to extend time of confinement

(1) In a shipper's action against a carrier for injury to an interstate shipment of live stock from improper handling and delay, wherein it was claimed that the stock had been confined more than twenty eight consecutive hours, bills of lading reciting that the time had been extended by the owner to thirty six hours were incompetent to prove the written request for extension required by Act Congr. June 29, 1906, § 1, U.S.Comp.St. § 8651, to be separate and apart from any printed bill of lading or other railroad form.—Bateham v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 192 N.W. 818, 195 Iowa 659.

(2) Where the shipment was intra-state, a written request to railroad to extend time of confinement of stock as prescribed by act of congress was properly excluded.—Bugg v. Perry & Faircloth, 156 S.E. 708, 42 Ga.App. 523.

(3) Even if such request could have any bearing on the question of the carrier's negligence, it was properly excluded where not acted on by the carrier.—Bugg v. Perry & Faircloth, supra.

(4) There being no consideration for such request, it was properly excluded, even if otherwise admissible.—Bugg v. Perry & Faircloth, supra.

9. Tex.—Wichita Valley Ry. Co. v. Baldwin, Civ.App., 263 S.W. 1090.

Incompetency of carrier's employee

Where injury is caused by violently bringing together uncoupled cars in which the animals were loaded, it may be shown that a brakeman on the train on which the injury occurred was unfit for service.—Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Johnson, Tex., 19 S.W. 867.

Precautions against further accidents

Where one of the issues was as to defendant's negligence in not providing suitable facilities for unloading stock, the fact that precautions were taken after the injury by constructing improvements for that purpose is not an admission of prior negligence, and is admissible.—Hines v. Duncan & Nelms, 104 S.E. 519, 25 Ga.App. 712.

the fact that other shipments, made under similar conditions, reached their destination without injury may be shown;[15] but such evidence is not admissible where the shipments were not made under the same conditions,[16] or over the same route.[17] So, where carriers claimed that damages to a shipment of cattle were due to plaintiff's negligence in unloading and dipping them under quarantine regulations, evidence that the same treatment was accorded other cattle which were not injured is properly excluded, in the absence of a showing that they were in the same physical condition.[18] Evidence of injury or want of injury to other live stock, belonging either to plaintiff or to others, and shipped at the same time on the same cars or train has been held admissible on the issue of negligence.[19] So, in an action for injuries to a shipment of live stock in several cars, evidence of the condition of animals in a car as to which no notice of damage was filed is admissible to show the condition of animals in other cars, all animals being commingled at destination.[20] Where it was shown that plaintiff's stock was in the same condition as the stock of another shipper at the time of shipment and that both shipments were in good condition when they reached the point where plaintiff's stock alone was switched, evidence that, after the switching, plaintiff's stock was found injured, while the stock of the other shipper was unhurt, was admissible;[21] but evidence as to the condition of other stock handled on the same train and arriving at the same destination is not admissible where there is nothing to show that the conditions were the same or similar.[22] Evidence that plaintiff's stock, on a former shipment, was roughly treated is inadmissible.[23] The carrier cannot show in defense of an action for negligently unloading stock in defective pens that such pens were similar to those on other portions of its line.[24] Plaintiff may testify as to whether he ever had any cattle killed in the same quantity, at any other time when shipped over defendant's road.[25]

Customary methods. The customary manner of performing the carrier's duties in transporting live stock may be shown on the issue of negligence.[26] Accordingly, evidence of the customary time and method of assembling stock for shipment is admissible on the issue whether defendant carrier had so equipped its yard that animals awaiting shipment could receive proper care during a reasonable time prior to loading.[27] So, to refute negligence in the care of animals injured in transit, the carrier may show by persons qualified to testify that the car stall was put up in the customary manner of erecting stalls for the shipment of animals, and that it was reasonably safe;[28] but it has been held that evidence of the carrier's former custom to unload live stock upon its arrival at a certain point is in-

Bedding of cars for other shipments

The fact that a shipment of cattle, in cars bedded by the shipper, arrived in good condition may not be proved to show that the death of cattle, in another shipment of the same character, loaded in about the same manner, in about the same kind of cars, and made at the same time, for about the same distance, but over another route, was caused by negligence of the carrier in bedding the cars.—Houston, etc., R. the carrier may show that other animals on the same train and in another car reached their destination without injury.—Sinsabaugh v. Cleveland, etc., R. Co., 149 Ill.App 642.

Accounting for want of injury to other stock

Where cattle of another shipper, loaded near the front end of train, were not injured by head-on collision, proof that jolt to plaintiff's cattle loaded at the rear end of the train was more severe than the jolt to the cattle loaded near the front was proper, to account for the difference in effect of the collision on plaintiff's cattle and the other cattle.—Wichita Valley Ry. competent to prove negligence of the carrier in not unloading stock upon its arrival at that point.[29]

g. Deterioration or Other Injury from Delay

Where it is sought to recover for injury to inanimate freight or live stock, due to the negligent delay of the carrier, the admissibility of evidence is governed by the usual rules Evidence as to the usual running time between two points is admissible. The time taken for other shipments may be shown where the conditions are similar

In an action for injury to goods, such as injury due to deterioration of perishable articles, caused by delay in delivery by the carrier, any competent evidence which is relevant and material on the issue of delay, and the liability of the carrier for consequent injuries, is admissible,[30] and this applies to actions for injury to live stock due to delay.[31] Evidence as to the usual running time between two points on defendant's line is admissible on the issue of negligent delay causing injury to perishable goods[32] or live stock,[33] but evidence which is irrelevant or immaterial is properly excluded.[34] Thus evidence as to the time it would have taken to ship plaintiff's live stock by another route, over other lines than those of defendant, is inadmissible.[35] So evidence that the delay which resulted in injury to perishable goods was caused by congestion in traffic is inadmissible, since such congestion, as stated supra § 245, does not excuse the carrier's negligence in causing injury to property transported by it.[36]

Admissibility of evidence in actions for delay generally see supra § 217.

Similar occurrences, other shipments. Evidence as to the time it took to deliver other shipments over the same line is admissible where the testimony shows that the conditions connected with the shipments were similar,[37] but in the absence of any showing that the conditions of the shipments were similar, such evidence is inadmissible.[38] On the same principle, evidence as to the time it took witness to drive a truck over a stated route is inadmissible, in the absence of evidence showing that the conditions as to the size of the truck, the traffic, and the weather, were similar to the conditions existing when defendant's driver made the trip in question.[39]

h. Acts or Negligence of Shipper

That the loss or injury was due to the acts or negligence of the shipper may be proved or disproved by any competent, relevant, and material evidence.

Plaintiff's knowledge of congestion in traffic

Refusal to admit evidence that plaintiff knew of congestion resulting from failure of consignees to unload cars, but nevertheless persisted in shipping perishable produce, held error in action against carrier for delay whereby the produce deteriorated in transit.—Free Bros. Evidence irrelevant

In action for damages to shipment of strawberries, objection to question as to whether produce trains did not sometimes arrive at point of destination earlier than regular running time was properly sustained, as it had no bearing on question of delay, and would serve to confuse and mislead jury.—Peninsula Produce Exch. v. Former shipment of perishable goods

In suit against railroad for spoilage of fruit and vegetables from delay, bills of lading and proof of the due arrival of prior shipments were incompetent, without proof of times of delivery to carriers.—Chesapeake & O R Co. v. Coleman Fruit Co., 294 S W. 463, 219 Ky. 794.

Subsequent shipment of live stock

On an issue as to liability of a railroad company for loss and damage to stock in shipment, alleged to have been due to improper handling and delay in the transportation, evidence that another shipment a month later went through in two days' less time and with much smaller loss, without showing the comparative condition of the cattle, the conditions under which the shipments were made, or whether the time made was usual or unusual, was incompetent, as introducing collateral and irrelevant issues.—Atchison, T. & S F Ry. Co. v. Merchants' Live Stock Co., C.C.A N M, 273 F. 130.

39. N.Y.—Thompson v. P. H. Keahon, Inc., 197 N Y.S. 686, 120 Misc. 70.

Any competent evidence is admissible which tends to prove or disprove the contention that the loss or injury complained of was due to the acts or negligence of the shipper,[40] such as improperly packing the property[41] or in loading the car, where the duty of loading devolved on the shipper.[42] So, where the car in which the freight was transported was furnished by the shipper, the carrier may show that it was inadequate for the purpose;[43] and evidence that the car was owned and loaded by the shipper is competent.[44] To show negligence on the part of the shipper, evidence is competent that the stock was not in fit condition to stand transportation by rail at the time of the year when shipment was made, and that the effect of the cold would cause the cattle to become numb and lie down, and then be unable to get up.[45] Since a carrier is not liable for damages caused by following the instructions of the owner or his representative accompanying the shipment, as stated supra § 78, it is error to exclude evidence that the conductor obeyed instructions of the messenger who accompanied the goods, although there was no direct evidence that the messenger was employed by the shipper;[46] and it is also error to exclude a contract between the consignor and consignee authorizing the employment of a messenger to care for the goods.[47]

Evidence as to other property on same train. In an action for injuries to a shipment of hogs, the carrier defending on the ground that the shipper was negligent in bedding the car, evidence that twenty other cars of hogs were carried in the same train differently bedded were subjected to the same treatment, and were uninjured is admissible.[48]

1. Proof of Loss of Property

Evidence is admissible which tends to show that the shipment, or a part of it, was lost; but evidence as to losses of other freight is inadmissible.

Plaintiff may introduce any competent evidence tending to show the loss of all or a part of the property received by the carrier for transportation,[49] and for this purpose evidence that the car was sealed at the loading point and remained sealed

Disproving negligence of shipper

(1) In an action against an express company for damage to a shipment of horses, testimony of plaintiff that when he arrived on the train with the horses at a point in Iowa he was informed by a stranger, who told him he was agent of the express company in charge of another car, that he could not ride to Chicago on the train with the horses, etc, was admissible to repel the allegation that plaintiff was negligent in failing to exercise his contract privilege to travel with the shipment—Gibson v. Adams Express Co., 175 N.W. 331, 187 Iowa 1259.

(2) Evidence that the shipper of a convict car destroyed by fire while on defendant's flat car gave directions to his servant to look after the fire in a stove which was in the car is not admissible—Coweta County v Central of Georgia Ry. Co., 60 S.E. 1018, 4 Ga.App. 94.

(3) To show due care on his part, the shipper may testify that he did not know that a permit to unload cattle in the state of destination was necessary.—Hendrick v Boston, etc. R. Co, 48 N.E. 835, 170 Mass 44.

Inadequate crate for animal

Where, in an action for value of hog lost in transit defendant carrier interposed the defense that the crate used by the shipper was too small for the hog, testimony of plaintiff's witnesses that they saw the crate in defendant's office at destination at the time of trial was properly admitted, where plaintiff had the right to compel the production of the crate in court to show what the actual measurements of the crate were, but did not know where it was until trial—Buck v American Railway Express Co, 192 N.W. 277, 195 Iowa 1024.

Condition of container when delivered to consignee

In action for loss of goods in cases in transit, testimony of shipping clerk of consignor, and of witnesses, as to condition of straps on case from which goods were alleged to have been taken, and of cartons therein when opened at store of consignee, was competent to show the loss.—Riff v Yadkin R. Co., 127 S.E. 588, 189 N.C. 585.

until delivery of the goods to the consignee is admissible.[50] So evidence that the consignees had never received the goods is admissible as tending to show that the carrier had never delivered them at the place of destination as provided for by the contract of shipment,[51] but evidence as to losses or thefts of other freight belonging to other persons is not admissible.[52] A shipper suing the carrier as for loss of goods shipped may, on the carrier's showing an offer to deliver, show the conduct of the carrier estopping it to contend that the goods were not lost but only delayed, as, for instance, a statement by the carrier that they were lost and could not be found, relying on which plaintiff bought new goods.[53]

j. Limitation of Liability in General

A contract limiting the carrier's liability may be shown, if valid, and assented to by the shipper; otherwise not.

In an action for loss of, or injury to, property received by the carrier for transportation, a contract limiting the carrier's liability, signed by the shipper, is ordinarily admissible in behalf of the carrier.[54] The carrier may show that under the contract it was liable only for negligence,[55] or that the contract exempted it from liability for loss by fire,[56] but where the statute forbids common carriers to limit or restrict their common-law liability, a contract of shipment containing such limitation is inadmissible.[57] So, where a carrier's liability for goods destroyed before their delivery to the consignee was tried on the single issue of defendant's negligence, and was so submitted to the jury, the exclusion of an alleged contract offered by defendant, whereby its liability was limited, was held not to be error, since a carrier cannot limit its liability for negligence,[58] and a bill of lading limiting the carrier's liability, signed by an employee of the shipper, is properly excluded where it appears that such employee had no authority to sign and that the shipper did not consent to the limitation.[59] Evidence of shippers of live stock that the carrier had never offered them any contract of shipment except one containing a limitation of its liability was admissible to show that the carrier did not hold itself ready to make a contract assuming common-law liability.[60] A provision of a shipping contract releasing the carrier from liability for loss from delay due to storms or floods is properly excluded as immaterial, in an action for damage to live stock from delay.[61] Where it was not shown that the agent of the carrier or the shipper knew that a special rate would be or was given, in consideration of a waiver by the shipper of liability by the carrier for loss or damage by fire, it was not error to refuse to permit a clerk in the general freight department to testify that the carrier had in force two rates,

Inquiries by plaintiff

The fact that plaintiff after the time when the goods should have been delivered made inquiries for them of the carrier is admissible to show the loss of the goods—Ingledew v. Northern R Co., 7 Gray, Mass, 86.

Affidavits of weighers of boards of trade is admissible under Illinois statute providing that sworn statement of a person having personal knowledge of the weight of grain delivered for shipment shall be taken as true—Farmers' Grain Co of Dorans v. Illinois Cent. R. Co, 201 Ill. App 261

Report of stockyards company

Where carrier agreed to deliver hogs shipped to commission company at point of destination, which was done through a stockyards company, the report of that company that seventy five live hogs and eight dead ones had been received by it was admissible in shipper's action.—Galveston, H & S A Ry Co. v Friedrichs, Tex Civ App, 252 S.W. 346

Nature of restriction

In action for damage to a shipment of live stock because of rough handling and severe weather, it was not error to exclude the shipping contract whereby the shipper assumed all risk and expense of feeding, watering, and caring for the shipment, in effect shipping the cattle at his own risk, in view of L 1911 p 153, providing that no carrier can by contract exempt itself from liability as a common carrier—Cravens v. Hines, Mo App., 218 S. W 912

61. Tex.—Ft. Worth & D. C. Ry. Co. v. Atterberry, Civ App, 190 S W. 1133.

Reason for exclusion

Under such contract provision, if the storm or flood was so unprecedented that it could not reasonably have been anticipated and guarded against, the carrier would be excused without regard to such provision, and if the storm or flood, although extraordinary and unusual, might, reasonably have been anticipated and guarded against, failure to take precautions might be considered by the jury as negligence, against which a carrier cannot contract.—Ft. Worth & D. C. Ry. Co. v Atterberry, Tex.Civ.App, 190 S. W. 1133.

one by which less was charged, in consideration of such a waiver, than where there was no such waiver.[62] So, where a contract limiting liability is extorted from the shipper by refusal to ship except on these terms, he may show the falsity of recitals in the contract that opportunity was given him to ship on more favorable terms, and that he elected to accept the restrictive contract on a lower rate.[63]

Assent of shipper. In jurisdictions where express assent by the shipper to exemptions inserted in a contract of shipment must be shown by the carrier, see supra §§ 91, 254, the fact that the consignor had on prior occasions signed similar contracts of shipment is competent as tending to show knowledge of the restrictive conditions contained in the particular contract in suit.[64] The nondelivery of a bill of lading until several days after receipt of the goods by the carrier is admissible to prove nonassent by the shipper to the restrictive provisions contained in the bill of lading.[65] It is competent for the shipper and his witnesses to testify that they had never read the bill of lading; that they did not know at the time of receiving it what provisions were contained therein; that they did not have any talk with any agent of the carrier concerning the terms and conditions of the bill of lading, and that their attention had never, up to the time of the loss sued for, been called to the conditions and limitations contained in such bill of lading.[66] So evidence that the shipper never read a receipt limiting the carrier's liability is admissible on the question whether he consented to vary an oral contract of shipment so as to make it accord with such receipt.[67]

k. Notice of Claim

The general rules govern the admissibility of evidence to show compliance with a requirement of notice of claim, or a waiver thereof by the carrier.

In an action for loss of, or injury to, property delivered to a carrier for transportation, the general rules govern the admissibility of evidence as to whether notice of a claim for loss or injury, required by the contract of shipment, was given[68] within the prescribed time,[69] and whether such requirement was waived by the carrier.[70] Plaintiff's testimony that he prepared a written notice as required by the contract of shipment, and left it with his commission firm at destination of the goods, and that they afterward wrote him that they had filed it with defendant, is incompetent.[71] A claim for property lost in transit, presented to the carrier in accordance with the requirement of the bill of lading, is admissible, not to establish the price of the property, although such claim set forth the price, but to show compliance with the requirement of notice.[72]

Letters

(2) In an action against an initial carrier for damages to a shipment, a letter written to a connecting carrier's claim agent is admissible to show that notice of the claim required by the shipping contract was given to the claim agent.—Galveston, etc., R. (2) Correspondence between the parties tending to show a waiver of a stipulation limiting the time to sue is admissible.—Naumen v. Great Northern R. Co., 154 N.W. 1076, 131 Minn. 217.

(1) In General

General rules apply in determining the admissibility of evidence on the question of damages for loss of, or injury to, property in transit. Evidence is admissible to show the plaintiff's efforts to minimize the damages.

General rules apply in determining the admissibility of evidence of damages for loss of, or injury to, property received by a carrier for transportation. Any evidence, which is otherwise competent, is admissible when, and only when it is relevant and material to the issue.[73] In an action for loss of a portion of the goods shipped, evidence as to the value of those delivered is admissible as fixing relatively the value of those not delivered;[74] and, if the goods have been shipped in fraud of the revenue laws, without payment of the tax due thereon, the amount of tax which should have been paid may be taken into account in determining the value of the goods.[75] In an action for injury to cattle by dipping in crude oil, general evidence as to the tendency of such action to injure stock is admissible, as tending to show the amount of damage.[76] Where a shipper paid the regular rate for the shipment of used motors, a bill of lading mailed to the shipper after transportation had begun, in which there was no agreed valuation or stated rate, was inadmissible to show that the motors were shipped as junk, and hence to diminish the amount of recovery, although such bill of lading contained a statement by the carrier's agent that the shipment was "junk motors."[77] In an action for injury to goods, the original and amended petitions were not admissible as a whole to show that plaintiff demanded a greater sum in his amended petition than he demanded in his original petition.[78]

Expenses. Evidence of the cost of returning a model, damaged in transit, to plaintiff's shop for repairs, is admissible;[79] and where such expense is claimed as an element of damage it is error to exclude evidence as to the necessity of returning the model to the shop had it not been damaged.[80] Where it is claimed that separate shipments by plaintiff were commingled, evidence of the amount paid by him to have the shipments assorted at destination was admissible.[81] Evidence of the cost of reshipping cattle, injured in transit, from the place of destination to the place where they were ulti-

Injury to live stock

(1) In action for injuries to cattle, wherein plaintiff did not seek recovery for value of calves lost, and there was no issue that would permit such recovery, but there was testimony that the negligence, want of feed and water, and exposure complained of would tend to cause cows bearing calves to lose them and thus injure the cows, evidence as to the number of calves he lost the next spring from the cows was relevant to the issue of the damage to the cows.—Payne v. Richards, Tex Civ. App., 248 S W. 771.

(2) The carrier when sued for injuries to cattle in transit may offer evidence of improvement of such cattle or recovery from their injuries, to show the extent of the injury at the time of their arrival and the resulting damages.—Panhandle & S. F. Ry Co v Norton, Tex Civ App., 188 S W. 1011.

(3) In an action against a railroad for damage to castrated bulls through delay in transit, it was held that plaintiff's testimony, showing the difference in the weight of the cattle at shipping point and their weight when unloaded at destination, was not improperly received, as not taking into consideration the fact that the cattle were castrated just before being shipped.—Cunningham v. Chicago & A. R. Co., Mo., 215 S. W. 5

(4) In suit for damages to horses and mules during transportation, account of sales shown to have been correct was admissible to show number of animals damaged.—Jones v. St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co, 50 S.W 2d 217, 226 Mo.App. 1152.

(5) In shipper's action for the death of a buffalo, due to the carrier's negligence, there was no error in excluding evidence as to the value of the robe which the carrier was not entitled to salvage, and which plaintiff had made from the hide, which was not shown to have any value.—Johnson v. mately sold, is inadmissible.[82]

Efforts to minimize damages. In an action by the consignee for injury to goods, plaintiff may show his own efforts to minimize the damage; and for that purpose his testimony that he tried to sell the goods, but that certain firms refused to make an offer, was admissible.[83]

(2) Market Value

General rules are applicable in determining the admissibility of evidence relating to the market value of property lost or injured by a carrier. Evidence of actual or intrinsic value is inadmissible where the property has a market value. To show the market value of injured property evidence of the price realized therefor at a sale is admissible, unless the sale occurred some time after delivery.

The general rule, hereinafter stated, infra § 264, is that the market value of goods shipped at the place of destination is the criterion of value by which the amount of damages for loss of, or injury to, the goods is to be determined. To establish that the goods had a market value at the place of destination, it is necessary to show that goods of like quality had been bought and sold at that place during the season in sufficient quantity and often enough to show a market value, and evidence which fulfills the requirements of such rule is admissible.[84] To prove what such market value is, it is proper to admit any evidence which is relevant and material to the issue and is competent under the general rules,[85] but evidence which does not meet the issue or is otherwise inadmissible under the general rules should be excluded.[86] Any evidence which would tend to fix the amount which the injured property would have brought if it had reached its destination in good condition is admissible.[87] Where it is shown that there was a market value at the place of destination for the kind of property shipped, plaintiff may testify as to what that market value of the property was in the condition in which it was delivered at that place,[88] or state the difference in market value in the condition in which the property arrived at destination and in "good condition."[89] Where perishable property would have arrived at its destination in the good marketable condition in which it was delivered to the carrier had the carrier performed its duty, evidence of the market value of the goods at destination is admissible without making any allowance for the natural deterioration during transportation.[90] The market quotations in centers of trade may be shown as proof of the price at which such property was selling on a particular day,[91] but the statements of plaintiff's broker as to the condition of the market is hearsay, and inadmissible.[92]

In an action for loss of, or injury to, live stock in transit, evidence as to the value of the animals at destination, and as to what would have been their value had they arrived in the condition in which they were loaded at the starting point, was admissible to establish plaintiff's damages,[93] although there was no evidence to show what their condition at destination would have been had they been transported with ordinary care.[94] The fact that cattle had to be fed and cared for some time after the injury before they began to show signs of improvement may be shown to enable the jury to judge of the correctness of the estimate of depreciation,[95] and it may be shown that the injured cattle did not fatten or respond to feed as well as did uninjured cattle in the same shipment, so that, although treated in the same way, they made much less gain than they should have made.[96]

Evidence of the market value of the property at a place other than its destination is not admissible,[97] although evidence as to the market value at a place near the point of destination has been held admissible.[98] Where the property is shown to have a market value at destination, evidence of the price paid for it,[99] or for similar property,[1] or evidence of its intrinsic value,[2] is inadmissible.

The law relating to the admissibility of evidence to show the market value of personal property generally is discussed in the C.J.S. title Evidence § 183, also C.J. p 186 note 91–p 189 note 25.

Price obtained on sale of property. To show the market value of property lost, evidence as to what was received from the sale of the remaining property of the same shipment at place of destination at time of delivery is admissible.[3] Where property is injured in transit, evidence of the amount realized at a sale of the property is admissible to show the difference between its value in a sound condition and as injured;[4] but since the value is to be estimated as of the time of delivery, evidence as to what the property sold for at some time later than the delivery is inadmissible.[5] So, in an action for damages to cattle, where they were fed for three or four months after the injury and then were sold, testimony as to whether the owner received the full market value should be excluded, because tending to carry the inquiry into collateral and speculative issues;[6] and such evidence is not admissible as tending to lessen the damages because not furnishing a correct basis for determining the injury.[7]

(3) Where Property Has No Market Value at Destination

Evidence that the property lost or injured has no market value is admissible Where no market value is shown, the actual or intrinsic value may be proved by any relevant and material evidence admissible under the general rules.

In an action for loss or injury to goods or live stock shipped, it is competent to show that there was no market for the property at the place of destination.[8] Where the property is without market value, or has no market value at the place of shipment,[9] or where it is doubtful whether the jury would find that it had a market value at the place of destination,[10] evidence of its actual or intrinsic value is admissible.

For the purpose of showing actual value, any facts are admissible which will enable the jury intelligently to arrive at a fair valuation.[11] Thus ev-

(4) General condition and quality of property and the percentage of

idence may be admitted to show the cost of the property,[12] its value at the point of shipment[13] or at other markets,[14] the price for which other property of the same kind was previously sold by plaintiff a short time before the loss or the injury complained of,[15] and the price at which plaintiff had contracted to sell the property at the point of destination.[16] Where, however, there is no evidence of market value either in the injured condition of cattle when delivered or in the condition in which they should have arrived, evidence that the cattle were worth a certain sum less per head than they would have been worth had they been transported without negligence is inadmissible.[17] It has been held that the value of a portion of the property may be estimated with reference to the value of the remaining property or to the total value of the whole.[18] So, where animals, such as race horses, have no market value at the place of destination, evidence of the condition, temper, disposition, and character of the horses when received by the carrier, and of the effect of these traits on their value, and that the injuries received would affect their racing qualities and value is competent in determining the actual value of the horses,[19] as is also evidence of the number of races the horses have won, and of the class of horses raced with.[20] On the other hand, where, in an action against a carrier for injury to colts while in transit, the shipper shows as his damages the difference in the value of the colts before and after the injury, by estimating their value at the point of shipment and what they brought at the point of destination at a sale, the carrier is entitled to show that the sale at the point of destination was a failure, and that the price offered for colts there was not a fair test of their value.[21]

(4) Value or Method of Computing Same Fixed by Contract

A contract fixing the value of the property shipped is admissible, and such contract may be proved by any competent evidence. If the shipping contract fixes the value of property at the place of shipment, evidence of its value at the place of destination is inadmissible.

The value of the property shipped, fixed by a valid contract of shipment, is ordinarily controlling in an action to recover for loss of, or injury to, the property, as previously stated, supra § 113. Such contract, signed by the shipper or his agent, is competent evidence.[22] However, where the shipping contract limits the value of live stock shipped to a designated amount for each, the shipper, in an action for injuries to the stock, is not thereby precluded from showing that the actual value of the stock injured exceeded the designated sum, not for the purpose of allowing a greater recovery per head, but to enable the jury to estimate the damage done to each animal within the limits specified.[23] Evidence that the shipper's agent falsely stated the value of the property, thereby obtaining a lower freight rate, and preventing the carrier from providing adequate insurance, is admissible so far as relevant on the question of value.[24] Where the carrier charged a rate fixed on the valuation of the property by the shipper, and would not be liable in case of loss for an amount greater than the declared value, it was error to exclude a schedule filed with the interstate commerce commission showing graduated rates based on valuations.[25] So, in an action to recover for cattle killed in shipment, an order published by a state corporation commission prescribing rates to be charged for carrying certain grades or values of cattle, is competent to prove the rates so fixed;[26] and testimony on behalf of the carrier as to the rates actually charged by the carrier and paid by the shipper is competent to show the class or grade under which plaintiff shipped his cattle;[27] but the classification of the interstate commerce commission based on a valuation clause in a bill of lading for a stock shipment is inadmissible in an action for damages to stock where there was not in evidence a bill of lading containing a valuation clause.[28] Where plaintiff denied that he gave any valuation of the property to the agent of the carrier who made out the contract of shipment, and whether there was a declared or release value was open to question under the written evidence, it was proper to ask the agent what he said to plaintiff regarding the release value, and what plaintiff said to him.[29]

Provision for computing value at place of shipment. Evidence of the value of the property at the place of destination is inadmissible where the contract of shipment provides that the amount of loss or injury shall be computed at the value of the property at the place of shipment.[30]

(5) Claim for Damages

A claim for damages filed before suit is ordinarily admissible to show that at that time plaintiff claimed a less amount of damages than that stated in his petition.

Ordinarily plaintiff's claim for damages filed before suit is brought for injury to property shipped is admissible to show that at that time he claimed a less amount of damages than that stated in the petition[31] or testified to by him as a witness;[32] and such evidence is not objectionable as being an offer of compromise;[33] but where the legal measure of damages was the market value of the several pieces of machinery broken in transit, and not of substituted pieces subsequently purchased, it was proper to exclude a written claim presented by plaintiff which specified articles alleged to have been lost, giving the price thereof, and including the cost of machine work and expense in putting in new parts.[34]

§ 256. Weight and Sufficiency of Evidence

The weight and sufficiency of the evidence in an action against a carrier for the loss of, or injury to, property is governed by the general rules of evidence.

The general rules as to the weight and sufficiency of evidence are applicable in an action against a carrier for loss of, or injury to, property delivered to it for transportation.[35] These rules have been applied to evidence offered to show plaintiff's right

Degree of proof

Where a carrier has wrongfully injured property in its possession for purpose of carriage, the same high degree of proof of ownership is not required in an action against it for damages to the property as is required when the contest is between individuals each claiming the title, although a carrier who wrongfully injures property is not called on to answer to one without interest, even though the party in interest refuses to assert his right.—Gray & Barash v. Degree of proof

The requirement that the consignee to recover for loss of goods must show that they were delivered to the carrier does not require the proof to be such as to shut out every possibility of error, but requires only such proof as will convince a reasonable man.—Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Rosenthal Dry Goods Co., Tex.Civ.App., 207 S.W. 167.

When custom or usage is relied on to show a constructive delivery of the goods to the carrier, such custom or usage must be clearly and definitely shown, and where the evidence is uncertain and contradictory it will be deemed insufficient.—Gulf Coast Transp. Co. v. Howell, 70 So. 567, 70 Fla. 544

Preponderance of evidence

A carrier which seeks to impeach its own receipt, introduced by plaintiff to show delivery of goods to carrier, must explain or contradict it by a preponderance of the evidence.—Effron, Kushner & Co. v. American Ry. Express Co., 193 N.W. 539, 195 Iowa 1168

Effect of compliance with statute as to rest, water, and feed

In action for damage to live stock during transportation, railroad's compliance with Act Congr. June 29, 1906 § 1, U.S.Comp.St. § 8651, prohibiting confinement of live stock for more than twenty-eight consecutive hours, without unloading for rest, water, and feeding, is strongly evidential of railroad's diligent performance of its common-law duties of feeding, watering, and resting stock, but not conclusive.—Hogg v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 127 S.E. 830, 33 Ga.App. 773.

Mere conjecture insufficient

(1) Mere conjecture cannot be indulged in to establish negligence of carrier.—Cooper v. Oregon Short Line R. Co., 262 P. 873, 45 Idaho 313.

(2) In an action for injuries to animals alleged to have been received between certain points on defendant carrier's line, testimony that the animals looked like they had been knocked down in the car "by a heavy jerk or something" was too vague to be of value, and was obviously the mere conjecture of the witness, and was insufficient to show negligence of the carrier.—Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. J. S. Carroll Mercantile Co., 89 So. 509, 206 Ala. 320.

(5) In cases of shipment of perishable fruits and vegetables, when carrier shows affirmatively that it handled them in a method requested by shipper, and that it exercised reasonable care to prevent any damage from any cause not necessarily involved in the method of transportation so chosen, it has satisfied requirements of law in regard to quantum of proof required to establish a defense in an action for damages to the shipment.—Southern Pac. § 257. Trial

The matters relating to the trial of actions against carriers for loss of, or injury to property, discussed herein, are confined to the determination of what are questions of law for the court, and what are questions of fact for the jury, infra § 258; the necessity, propriety and sufficiency of the instructions to the jury, infra § 259; and the sufficiency and effect of the verdict and findings, infra § 260.

§ 258. Questions of Law and Fact

a. In general
b. Particular questions of fact
c. Particular questions of law

a. In General

Whether an issue in an action against a carrier for the loss of, or injury to, property should be submitted to the jury or determined by the court as a matter of law is governed by the rules applicable in civil actions generally.

In accordance with the general rules, where the evidence in an action against a carrier for loss of, or injury to, property is conflicting and different conclusions could be drawn therefrom,[61] or where plaintiff has made out a prima facie case against the carrier,[62] the issue should be submitted to the jury, and not be withdrawn by directing a verdict, granting a nonsuit, or sustaining a demurrer to the evidence.[63] On the other hand, where the facts in such action are undisputed or there is no substantial conflict in the evidence, and but one conclusion could reasonably be drawn therefrom, the question is one of law for the court,[64] and in such case the court may or should take the case from the jury by directing a verdict, granting a nonsuit, or sustaining a demurrer to the evidence.[65]

Determination of right to nonsuit. In passing on the carrier's motion for nonsuit, a contract of carriage not offered or admitted in evidence cannot be considered by the court.[66]

b. Particular Questions of Fact

Where the evidence is conflicting and different conclusions could reasonably be drawn therefrom, it is for the jury to determine the question of plaintiff's right to sue, the delivery of the property to the carrier, its loss or injury in transit, the cause of such loss or injury, the negligence of the carrier, the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, and the various other issues arising in the action.

Where the evidence is conflicting and different conclusions could be drawn therefrom, it is for the jury to determine whether plaintiff is the owner of the property lost or injured,[67] and is entitled, otherwise, to maintain the action,[68] whether defendant

Dipping cattle

Guttie

Where there was conflict in evidence as to whether guttie was cause of death of stallion while in transportation in railroad car, whether guttie was result of inherent weakness or propensity and whether guttie could result from external violence for which carrier would be liable, court could not say as matter of law that evidence conclusively showed that death was due to inherent weakness or propensity alone, and direct verdict for railroad—Vander Beek v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., Iowa, 278 N.W. 201.

Negligence of carrier or inherent viciousness of animals

Iowa.—Vincent, Albin & Strahl v. Hines, 200 N W. 1, 198 Iowa 1224.

Negligence or previous diseased condition

(1) In an action against an express company for damages for the death of a sow shipped in a crate, whether the death resulted from the defendant's neglect or from a diseased condition which might have existed before shipment was held, in view of the evidence, for the jury.—Alexanery;[89] whether the instrumentalities for receiving,[90] transporting,[91] or unloading[92] were sufficient; whether the carrier's negligence concurred with an act of God in causing the injury;[93] whether there was negligent or unreasonable delay causing damage to the goods[94] or live stock;[95] what is the prop-der v. American Ry. Express Co., 193 N.W. 560, 195 Iowa 1155.

(2) In an action by the shipper against a carrier for death of a hog in shipment, where plaintiff's evidence tended to show that the death of the hog was caused by negligent transporting in a sealed car not properly ventilated, and defendant's evidence tended to show that the death was caused by a disease contracted by the hog before it was delivered to the carrier, a refusal to give a general affirmative charge for defendant, and leaving the question of the cause of the death of the hog to the jury, was proper.—American Ry. Express Co. v. Dunnaway & Lambert, 92 So. 780, 207 Ala. 392.

Negligence and proximate cause of loss were held questions for jury, in shipper's action against carriers for death of cattle due to negligent failure to unload cattle already dead.—Houston E. & W. T. Ry. Co. v. Southern Pine Lumber Co., Tex.Civ. App., 6 S.W.2d 418.

Gross negligence

Whether conductor's refusal to take stock on through train as designated constituted gross negligence rendering railroad liable for exemplary damages was held a question for jury—Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry Co. v Hamilton, Civ.App., 57 S.W.2d 309, appeal dismissed 89 S.W.2d 208, 126 Tex. 542.

Rebuttal of presumption

Where a shipper has made a prima facie case of negligence against the carrier by proving delivery of live stock to it in good condition and failure of the carrier so to deliver it to consignee, testimony by the carrier's employees that the shipment was handled without negligence, even though not contradicted by testimony as to manner of handling, does not as a matter of law establish the carrier's freedom from negligence.—Ruebel Bros. v. American Express Co., 180 N.W. 658, 190 Iowa 600.

Refrigeration

Whether car furnished on plaintiff's requisition afforded standard refrigeration for service specified was question for jury on conflicting evidence—Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Evans, 134 S.E. 122, 35 Ga.App. 438.

Carrying fruit in ordinary box cars

Question whether carrier was negligent in carrying cherries in ordinary box cars during season when freezing weather was likely to occur in region in which destination of shipment lay held for jury, especially where shipper had agreed with carrier, through its employee, that insulated cars should be used—Norfolk & W. Ry. Co. v. Keystone Packing Co., 195 N.E. 403, 49 Ohio App. 136.

Infected car

Evidence held to present jury question whether car furnished by carrier was infected with cholera and whether hogs shipped contracted cholera therefrom.—St. Louis & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Slade, 291 P. 107, 144 Okl. 216.

Defective car or vicious propensities of animals

In an action against a railroad for injuries to horses sustained when they became prostrate because of legs protruding out of door, and were injured by other horses in same shipment, question whether injuries were caused by a defective door of the car, as claimed by shipper, or by the vicious propensities of the horses, as claimed by the railroad, held for jury—Moran v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., Mo.App., 255 S.W. 331.

Condition of spark arrester

In action for damages by fire from engine sparks, which set fire to a live stock car, where there was testimony that the spark arrester was defective, testimony of engineer that it was in good condition on the day after the fire made a jury question whether it was in good condition the night of the fire—Osborne v. Delay as proximate cause of damage

(1) Whether delay due to "tie-up" when train crew had worked maximum time under statute was proximate cause of damage to shipment was held a question for jury.—Saliba v. New York Cent. R. Co., 144 A. 194, 101 Vt. 427.

(2) Under the evidence, whether the carrier's negligent delay in shipment of apples was proximate cause of freezing of shipment was held a question for jury.—Bernstein v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 208 N.W. 679, 234 Mich. 614.

Whether carrier furnished adequate facilities for ordinary conditions was question for jury in action for delay in delivering perishable goods—Free Bros. Co. v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 146 A. 98, 296 Pa. 441.

Excuse for delay

Evidence of notice that congestion existed in produce yards and that plaintiff nevertheless insisted on having perishable goods forwarded makes issue for jury as to whether carrier's delay is excused—Free Bros. Co. v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 146 A. 98, 296 Pa. 441.

Concurrence of negligence and act of God

Where the carrier, on receipt of a shipment of potatoes in December, agreed to deliver them immediately to connecting carriers, but failed to do so for nearly a week, and the potatoes were damaged by freezing, the question whether the carrier's negligent failure to make immediate delivery of the shipment as agreed, concurred with the act of God, so as to make it liable was held to be a question for the jury.—Merchants' & Miners' Transp. Improper bedding
In action for injuries to cattle in shipment, testimony of plaintiff's agent that cars were not properly bedded, and that he knew that cattle could not properly be shipped in unbedded cars for long distances, did not show contributory negligence as a matter of law, in the absence of evidence as to the distance the cattle were shipped.—Beaumont, S. Shipper's nonperformance of rule of carrier

Unloading goods
(1) In action for damages to shipment of steel girders, whether crane operator whose negligence caused damage to girders was in employ of railroad or consignee was held a question for jury, notwithstanding consignee paid costs of a crane for unloading the girders and operation of crane.—Indemnity Ins. Co. of North America v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co, C.C.A.Ariz., 85 F.2d 438, rehearing denied 85 F.2d 1006.

(2) Tariff rule requiring consignee to unload from cars freight received by carriers carried at carload ratings held not to compel inference that unloading of interstate shipment of girders was performed by consignee, rather than railroad, where transportation of girders from destination to point of unloading was not under tariffs, but on a new and entirely separate and unusual compensation for special and intricate services.—Indemnity Ins. Limitation of amount of liability
(1) Where a shipper's agent, not knowing the value of the goods shipped, on suggestion of the carrier's agent, arbitrarily fixed a sum far below the true value, and the rate was based on such fixed value, the arrangement could not as matter of law be held a bona fide effort to fix the value, so as to limit recovery to the amount agreed on.—Bailey v. American Ry Express Co, 108 S.E. 303, 27 Ga App 364, affirmed American Ry. Express Co v. Bailey, 113 S.E 551, 154 Ga. 96.

(2) In shipper's action for lost goods, whether valuation limiting carrier's liability appeared on shipping order when signed by shipper was held for jury.—Anderson v. Atitation has been waived;[4] whether a stipulation in the contract of shipment limiting the time within which notice of a claim for damages was reasonable;[5] whether such notice was given in accordance with the requirements of the contract;[6] whether the limitation was waived by the carrier;[7] what is a reasonable time for delivery of the property within a provision requiring notice of the claim to be given within a specified time after the lapse of a reasonable time for delivery;[8] whether there was negligence on the part of the carrier obviating the necessity of giving timely notice, within the Cummins amendment permitting recovery for loss due to negligence, although no claim is filed;[9] whether the company is liable as a carrier or as a warehouseman;[10] the nature and extent of the damages resulting from the loss or injury;[11] and whether plaintiff has used proper efforts to reduce the dam-

Limitation of time for bringing suit

(1) Reasonableness of, and compliance with, limitation.—Jackson v. Mauck, 126 N.E. 851, 189 Ind. 262.

(2) Under a provision of the uniform bill of lading requiring suits to be brought within two years and one day after a reasonable time for delivery has elapsed, ascertainment of what was a reasonable time for delivery was a question of fact for the jury, or for the court in a case tried by the court.

Okl.—Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co. v. Great Western Oil Co., 250 P. 776, 120 Okl. 150.

Limitation of liability to that of warehouseman

In action against a railroad company to recover for a carload of tin plate destroyed by fire while awaiting transfer to steamer at a port of export, defended on ground that, by giving notice of arrival to the steamship company, which was to export the goods, and to which the carrier had been directed to deliver the goods, the carrier had reduced its liability to that of warehouseman, it was held, under the evidence, that, whether the steamship company was the authorized agent of the party "entitled to receive" the goods, to whom it was proper to give such notice of arrival, was for the jury. —Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Co., 114 A. 730, 138 Md. 604.

Construction and effect of limitation

Where goods loaded in car on shipper's private siding were destroyed by fire after the carrier had moved it by its switch engine from the place of loading to another switch within the shipper's plant, it was a question for the jury whether the car had been attached to a train within a provision of the bill of lading exempting the carrier from liability until such goods were so attached, the definition of train as a continuous or connected line of cars on a railroad, adopted in the construction of other statutes, being of little assistance in construing that provision.—Atlantic Refining Co. v. ages.[12] Cases involving other issues which were held, under the evidence, to be for the jury to determine are set out in the notes.[13]

c. Particular Questions of Law

Where the evidence as to delivery of the property to the carrier, the carrier's negligence, the shipper's contributory negligence, and as to other issues affecting the carrier's liability for loss or injury, is undisputed, and but one conclusion can reasonably be drawn therefrom, the determination of the issue is a matter of law for the court.

Where the facts are undisputed or susceptible of but one conclusion, it is for the court to determine whether a contract of transportation was entered into between the shipper and carrier,[14] whether the property was delivered to and accepted by the carrier,[15] and the identity and value of the property;[16] whether the carrier was bound to know the character of the contents of packages intrusted to it;[17] the condition of the property upon arrival at the point of destination;[18] its delivery to the consignee;[19] whether the carrier was negligent generally, and whether such negligence caused the loss or injury;[20] whether there was negligent

(4) Where the evidence leaves it doubtful whether there was no market value of cattle at the place of delivery, the question becomes one for the jury.—Lancaster v. Tudor, Tex Civ App., 222 S W. 990.

(5) Depreciation in market value —Hines v. Davis, Tex.Civ.App., 225 S W. 862.

Expenses

Whether shippers' expenses, in reshipping damaged grain from point of destination to another city to be cleaned and prepared for market, were necessary and reasonable, was held to be a question for jury.—Panhandle & S. F. R. Co. v. Shell, Tex. Civ.App, 265 S W. 758.

Evidence held not undisputed

The question of amount of damage from crippling cattle in a live stock shipment cannot be taken from the jury, on the theory of undisputed testimony, because of an expert's estimate, what should go to the jury with all the other evidence tending to show the condition and value of the cattle —Bush v. Altschul, 193 S. W. 280, 128 Ark. 103.

12. Ill.—Wabash R. Co. v. Campbell, 76 N E. 346, 219 Ill. 312, 3 L R A., N.S., 1092.

13. Confiscation of property

Whether a shipment of chickens in possession of a carrier, which was caught in a flood, was confiscated by military authorities, martial law being declared in the district, so as to free the carrier from responsibility, was held under the evidence for the jury.—Chicago & E. I R Co. v. Collins Produce Co, Ill., 235 F. 857, 149 C C A. 169, affirmed 39 S.Ct. 189, 249 U.S. 186, 63 L Ed 552.

Offer to pay freight charges

In an action for the value of freight lost in transit, where the carrier charged that the shipper failed to pay the freight charges, there having been a conflict of testimony as to the shipper's offer to pay the freight, the question was for the jury—Clark v Baltimore & O. Ry. Co., 79 Pa.Super. 159.

Unreasonableness of shipper's instructions to carrier

Whether a particular request or instruction of the shipper is reasonable or unreasonable is a question for the jury.—Keat v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 154 N.W. 220, 98 Neb. 641.

16. Ark —Suckle v. Missouri Pac. R. Co, 241 S.W. 368, 154 Ark. 168.

Erroneous submission to jury

In an action against a railroad for the value of goods lost or destroyed in transit, the undisputed testimony of plaintiff's clerk, who did most of the packing preparatory to shipment, that the invoices contained in a book, in which an itemized statement of each article packed and the value thereof was entered, were carefully and correctly made, and that the goods specified as being in each box were placed therein by him or under his supervision and were contained therein when shipped, constituted such definite proof of the contents of the boxes and value of the goods therein as rendered the submission of such questions to the jury reversible error—Suckle v. Missouri Pac. R Co., 241 S W. 368, 154 Ark 168.

Where the evidence is plain, clear, and undisputed, showing that personal property was received, transported, and put into the possession of, and under the dominion of, consignee at the point of destination, it is proper for the court to instruct the jury as matter of law that delivery had been made by the carrier.—Cripe v. Proximate cause

Evidence that alleged rough handling of train caused congestion of lungs which killed hogs in plaintiff's shipment was held insufficient to warrant submission to the jury on the question of negligence as the proximate cause of the loss.—Wiederin v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 237 N W 344, 212 Iowa 1103.

Testimony of caretaker accompanying cattle that at one station the train was cut in two, and one part was switched out of his sight, was held insufficient to warrant submission of the carrier's negligence in handling the train, such caretaker also having testified that when the train is in motion the cattle will stand and ride, and when not in motion will fight, lie down, and be trampled upon.—Galveston, H. & S. A. Ry. Co. v. Crowley, Tex Civ App., 214 S.W. 721.

Direction of verdict required

(1) Motion for directed verdict should be granted, where plaintiff shows nothing to establish his claim of carrier's negligence.—Cooper v. Oregon Short Line R Co., 262 P. 873, 45 Idaho 313.

(2) Where the evidence showed or unreasonable delay in transportation and delivery;[21] whether the consignee was guilty of contributory negligence;[22] whether the shipper's instructions to the carrier were violated;[23] what is a reasonable time for removal of shipment from carrier's premises;[24] and the extent of the damages sustained.[25]

Limitation of liability. Where the facts are undisputed or but one conclusion can be drawn therefrom, the liability of the carrier under a limitation clause in the contract,[26] including the reasonableness of the limitation,[27] and the reasonableness of the time for delivery under a contract requiring claims for loss to be made within a designated time after the lapse of a reasonable time for delivery,[28] are questions of law for the court; and in some cases it has been held, without discussion of the evidence, that the reasonableness of a limitation of liability is for the court.[29] that perishable goods were injured solely because of improper ventilation while awaiting unloading, and the contract provided that the ventilation should be taken care of by the shipper's messenger, refusal to direct a verdict for defendant carrier was error.—Louisville & N R Co. v. Riley, 160 N.E. 730, 27 Ohio App 188.

Demurrer to evidence properly sustained

(1) Demurrer to evidence was properly sustained, where shipper, having elected to stand upon specific grounds of carrier's negligence, failed to prove case as alleged.—Inzerillo v. Chicago, B. & Q R Co., 35 S. W.2d 44, 225 Mo.App 1213.

(2) Order overruling defendant's demurrer to evidence in action against carrier for goods alleged destroyed by fire erroneous, where plaintiff's evidence wholly fails to prove any act of negligence or fact from which inference of defendant's negligence can be reasonably drawn.—Davis v. Rivers, 229 P. 571, 103 Okl 198.

Wis.—Johnston v Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co, 246 N.W. 336, 210 Wis. 227.

Reasonable time

Although generally what is a reasonable time for transportation and the reasonableness and sufficiency of excuse for delay are for the jury, yet, where the evidence is uncontroverted, the question may be treated as one of law.—Purity Ice Cream & Dairy Co v. Adams Express Co., 187 N W. 296, 217 Mich. 593.

Facts not raising issue

Where consignee has no duty to watch explosives in carrier's care, fact that detectives hired by consignee failed to prevent explosion cannot raise contributory negligence issue.—Lehigh Valley R. Co v State of Russia, C C.A.N.Y., 21 F 2d 396, certiorari denied 48 S Ct. 159, 275 U. S. 571, 72 L.Ed. 432.

S.C.—Smith v. Southern Ry. Co., 113 S E. 465, 121 S C. 94.

Guess or vague estimate

(1) In action against railroad for damages to live stock, an item of damages pertaining to a horse with an injured knee, the evidence relied on by plaintiff in support of such item being a mere guess, was properly withdrawn by the court as not having sufficient support in evidence.—Cogley v. Chicago, B & Q R Co., 171 N.W. 745, 185 Iowa 1080.

(2) A vague estimate as to damage to a shipment based on a witness's examination of twelve to fifteen packages out of three hundred twenty-seven at the time of receipt, and the amount for which he sold them thirty or sixty days thereafter, was held insufficient to warrant submission to the jury of the amount of damage to the shipment.—Perkett v. Manistee & N E. R. Co, 157 N.W 388, 191 Mich 106.

Market value

Where measure of damage was based on market values, and no evidence was offered to show market condition, directing verdict for defendant was proper.—Willer v Chicago, M & St. P. Ry. Co, 210 N W. 81, 50 S D. 319.

Damages from fire or flood

In a shipper's action against a carrier for failure to deliver goods shipped, and which had been destroyed by fire, where there was no conflict as to the time, origin, and progress of the fire, the question of the sufficiency of the evidence, under special pleas that the carrier was not liable under limitation of bill of lading for damages from fire or flood not caused by its negligence, was held a matter of law for the court.—Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Patterson, 84 So. 471, 17 Ala.App 305

Notice of claim for damages

Whether limitation in a contract of live stock shipment of time to ninety-one days for notice of claim for damages is reasonable, and so valid, under Vernon's Sayles Civ.St. Annot 1914 art 5714, is a question for the jury, unless only one inference can be drawn from the testimony.—St. Louis, B & M. Ry Co. v. Marcofich, Tex Civ.App., 185 S.W. 51, affirmed, Com.App, 221 S.W. 582

Rule stated

(1) Under an interstate express receipt requiring notice of a claim for failure to deliver to be made within four months after a reasonable time for delivery has elapsed, what is a reasonable time for transportation is a question for the court, where the undisputed facts show so clear and manifest delay that the court may hold it unreasonable as matter of law.—American Ry. Express Co. v Roberts, 111 S E 744, 28 Ga.App. 510.

(2) If, upon the question of reasonableness of time for delivery under a shipper's contract requiring claim for loss to be made within four months after reasonable time for delivery, the facts are such as afford no ground for two different and intelligent opinions respecting it, the court may determine it as one of law.—Kahn v American Railway Express Co, 106 S E. 126, 88 W Va. 17.

§ 259. Instructions

a. In general
b. Negligence of carrier in general
c. Exceptions to common-law liability
d. Contractual limitation of liability
e. Damages
f. Presumptions and burden of proof

a. In General

The instructions in actions against carriers for loss of, or injury to, property transported are governed by the rules applicable in civil actions generally. An instruction which imposes a higher degree of proof than the law requires is erroneous.

The rules governing instructions in civil actions generally apply in actions against common carriers to recover for loss of or injury to property. Pursuant to such rules, it is the duty of the court to give correct instructions as to the law applicable to the case.[31] The instructions should not be contradictory,[32] vague or indefinite,[33] or otherwise misleading;[34] and if an instruction, as requested, is erroneous, indefinite, or incomplete, the court may modify it.[35] The instructions must be applicable to and limited by the issues raised by the pleadings and evidence;[36] and should not ignore any issues which there is evidence tending to support.[37] So the instructions must not invade the province of the jury,[38] exclude from the jury evidence

Instruction held proper
Ala.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Long, 105 So. 890, 213 Ala. 679.

Distinction between private and common carriers
Where evidence as to long-distance trips by truckman did not show whether they were made as common carrier or under special contract, requested rulings that, unless he held himself out to all as ready to do moving jobs like that undertaken for plaintiff in regular practice of his business, he was not common carrier, and that, if he only undertook such work occasionally by special bargain, he was not common carrier with reference to plaintiff's job, should have been given.—Houle v. Lewonis, 140 N.E. 427, 245 Mass. 254.

Law of agency
In an action against a transfer and baggage company for loss of a suitcase, call for which was taken by the baggage company's agent, its codefendant, the trial court properly charged the law of agency, and explained how the relationship of principal and agent may be created, the evidence and issues making it necessary.—Lee v. City Transfer & Baggage Co., 106 S.E. 506, 115 S.C. 517.

Destination of shipment
In a shipper's action against a carrier for injuries to live stock while in transit, it was not error in the charge to treat a certain point as the destination of the shipment, although such point was a different one from that designated in the contract of shipment, the undisputed testimony showing that the destination was by agreement changed while the shipment was in transit.—Hines v. Thornton, Tex.Civ.App., 251 S.W. 523.

Commencement of liability
Instruction as to when carrier's liability attached in cattle shipment was held proper.—Panhandle & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Andrews, Tex.Civ.App., 278 S.W. 478.

Termination of liability
In action for damages to shipment of cattle from delay in transit, charge that responsibility of railroad ceased when cattle were delivered to stockyards company at destination and unloaded into pens was held as favorable as defendant railroads could ask.—Panhandle & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Crawford, Tex.Civ.App., 198 S.W. 1079.

35. Or.—Michellod v. Oregon-Washington R. & Nav. Co., 168 P. 620, 86 Or. 329.

Instances of proper modification
(1) Where the only issue was whether the cotton was placed on the platform for immediate shipment and so received by the railroad company, the modification of an instruction, on carrier's liability for loss by adding to the words "placed on the platform in the usual way" the words "for shipment," was proper.—W. F. Bogart & Co. v. Wade, 200 S.W. 148, 132 Ark. 49.

(2) Instruction stating that bill of lading recited that goods were in good order was properly modified, to state, according to the fact, that it recited that they were in apparently good condition, but that contents and condition of contents were unknown.—Michellod v. Oregon-Washington R. & Nav. Co., 168 P. 620, 86 Or. 329.

(3) Modification of instruction, that if consignee refused delivery carrier was not liable for resulting damage, by adding "without lawful reason" after "refused delivery," is not indefinite for failure to instruct as to what constitutes a lawful reason.—Crinella v. Northwestern Pac. R. Co., 259 P. 774, 85 Cal.App. 440.

which should be considered by them,[39] or assume as proved matters which are in issue.[40]

Definition of proximate cause. An instruction defining proximate cause as the efficient and moving cause without which the injury would not have occurred was not objectionable for failing to define the term "efficient and moving cause."[41]

Status as carrier or warehouseman. Instructions distinguishing the liability of a carrier as such and that of a warehouseman are properly given, where it was a question of fact in which of the two capacities the carrier acted,[42] but where the declaration charges defendant only as a common carrier an instruction submitting defendant's liability on the theory that he was a warehouseman is erroneous.[43] Instructions as to the termination of defendant's liability as carrier and commencement of liability as warehouseman should be correct in their statement of the law, and not misleading.[44]

Degree of proof. An instruction requiring a higher degree of proof than a preponderance of the evidence should not be given.[45] So an instruction that, in order to rebut the prima facie case made by the bill of lading as to the condition of the goods when received for transportation, the carrier must "show" that it was deceived and defrauded when the bill was signed, has been held erroneous as imposing on the carrier too high a degree of proof.[46]

b. Negligence of Carrier in General

The rules governing the necessity and propriety of instructions in civil actions generally are applicable to the instructions with respect to the negligence of a carrier sued for loss of, or injury to, property transported.

The general rules governing the sufficiency of instructions are applicable to instructions on the issue of the carrier's negligence. It is the duty of the court to instruct the jury as to the law applicable to the case.[47] The law should be cor-

44. Ga.—Davis v. Pearlman, 113 S.E. 44, 29 Ga.App. 12.
Instruction held correct
In action for failure to deliver cotton and for its injury by fire while held by defendant as common carrier, wherein it appeared that the shipper was consignee and the bill of lading provided for notice of its arrival to another, and for liability as warehouseman after forty-eight hours from such notice, and evidence showed its arrival at destination on July 24, and injury by fire in the carrier's warehouse nine days later, an instruction inaccurate in stating that, if notice was given consignee of its arrival on July 24, "defendant's duty and liability as a carrier terminated," was perhaps misleading, but was practically correct when applied to the facts, evidence showing notice on July 24, nine days before the admitted date of injury.—H. & L. M. Warten Cotton Co. v. Southern Ry. Co., 94 So. 726, 208 Ala. 417.
Instruction held erroneous
Where, in an interstate shipment, the bill of lading provides that if property is not removed within forty-eight hours exclusive of legal holidays after arrival, it may be kept subject to carrier's responsibility as warehouseman only, it was error in consignee's suit for value of goods burned after expiration of such time, to charge that status as carrier would not change to that of warehouseman until after the lapse of a "reasonable time" after such notice was given and received.—Davis v. Pearlman, 113 S.E. 44, 29 Ga.App. 12.

Tex.—Croom v. Galveston, H. & S. A. Ry. Co., Civ.App., 238 S.W. 733.
Instructions improperly refused
In action against carrier for injuries to mules in transit, carrier was entitled to charge that a common carrier is not an insurer of live stock received for transportation, but liable only for injuries caused by its own negligence.—Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Helms Bros., Tex.Civ.App., 210 S.W. 853.
Care required of carrier
Court should instruct that carrier is liable to consignee for want of reasonable care in transporting vegetables received in good condition.—Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Coleman Fruit Co., 294 S.W. 463, 219 Ky. 794.
Presenting defenses
(1) In action against carrier for injury to shipment of horses, in that one of the horses delivered by the carrier was injured and died a few days after delivery, where defendant pleaded two defenses, that it was not negligent in transporting the horse and that it delivered the horse in good condition and that it died later from a natural illness for which defendant was not responsible, as to which defenses the evidence was conflicting, and the general charge was insufficient to affirmatively present such defenses, the carrier was entitled, not only to a special charge presenting its defense of absence of negligence limited to the period ending with delivery of the horse, but also to a special charge presenting its defense of sickness and consequent death of the horse at any time, although it happened after the company had surrendered entire charge of the animal.—Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Gorman, 245 S.W. 418, 112 Tex. 147.

(2) Where, in an action for damage to a shipment of rice, the main issue was whether the injury was caused by the rice getting wet while being threshed or by the manner of handling during transportation, evidence held to entitle defendant carrier to special requested instruction

rectly[48] stated. Further, the law, under the general | rules governing the sufficiency of the instructions, that if damage shown was a result of a wet or damp condition of the rice when threshed, and of its subsequently being loaded in closed box cars, jury should find for defendant —Gulf Coast Transp Co v Standard Milling Co, Tex.Com App., 252 S W 751, reversing, Civ App, 197 S.W. 874

(3) In action for damages to shipment of cattle, where defendant, by its pleading and evidence, raised issue that damages were proximately caused by condition of cattle at time of delivery for shipment, and that they were in poor and weak condition, and unable to withstand ordinary incidents of transportation, court should have submitted such issue to jury, especially where it had instructed jury as to amount they could find for damages —Lancaster v. Instructions as to negligence generally held proper

(1) In an action for damages for deterioration in car of strawberries, instruction that carrier was liable, if it failed to furnish car properly equipped for refrigeration, or properly to refrigerate such car, when furnished to shipper, and contents were thereby damaged, was not objectionable as requiring carrier to have car iced to capacity at moment of delivery to shipper.—Tri-State Fruit Growers' Ass'n v. St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co., Mo.App, 264 S.W. 445.

(2) Where only fault imputed to carrier was in allowing beverage to freeze, instruction that although the beverage was frozen on its arrival the jury could not find for plaintiff, unless the evidence showed that its faulty or flat condition was due to the freezing, was proper.—Michellod v. Oregon-Washington R. & Nav. Co., 168 P 620, 86 Or 329.

Instructions as to negligent delay held proper

(1) In an action for damage to banana shipment through carrier's unreasonable delay, a charge that carrier was liable if delivery of shipment in damaged condition might have been avoided "or prevented" by reasonable prudence not exercised, was not error, although the care of the bananas was in the hands of the shipper—Saliba v. New York Cent. R. Co., 144 A. 194, 101 Vt. 427

(2) In action for damages to shipment of cattle by negligent delay and lack of care, which cattle the shipping contract obligated plaintiffs to care for as respects unloading and watering and feeding in transit, where there was evidence that, after the cattle were unloaded in transit, plaintiffs' employees cared for some of them, an instruction as to defendant's duty when the cattle were unloaded to feed and water them properly was erroneous, as failing to differentiate between the cattle actually taken charge of, herded, and cared for by plaintiffs and those which remained in defendant's charge—Phelps v. Great Northern Ry. Co., 213 P. 610, 66 Mont. 198, certiorari dismissed Great Northern Ry Co. v. Galbreath Cattle Co., 44 S Ct. 334, 264 U.S 571, 68 L Ed 855, reversed on other grounds 46 S Ct. 439, 271 U.S. 99, 70 L.Ed. 854.

Instructions as to negligence generally held improper

(1) Instruction that carrier would be liable for damage to seed received from ocean steamer and delivered in moldy condition, if some negligence of carrier concurred in causing damage, was erroneous, since the carrier would be liable only for such negligence as proximately contributed to the injury.—Harshaw, Fuller & Goodwin Co v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 252 Ill App. 253.

(2) In an action for damages for deterioration in car of strawberries, an instruction barring shipper's recovery, if shipper's negligence contributed in any degree to damage of berries, was properly refused, words "in any degree" being improper.—Tri-State Fruit Growers' Ass'n v. St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co., Mo. App., 264 S.W. 445.

(3) An instruction which in effect tells the jury that plaintiff was entitled to recover only in the event the peanuts were damaged after delivery to the carrier in proper condition for shipment, and that the carrier was not liable if they were delivered to it green and uncured, regardless of whether they were thereafter damaged through the carrier's negligence, was erroneous.—Cleburne Peanut & Products Co. v. Missouri, K & T Ry Co. of Texas, Com App., 221 S W. 270, reversing Civ.App., 184 S.W. 1070.

Instruction as to negligent delay held improper

In an action for injuries caused by negligent delay in the transportation of horses, causing influenza, and for injury to other horses which became infected with the same disease, an instruction placing the carrier's liability for injury to the horses transported and to the other horses on the same ground, was improper, since the

must be clearly stated,[49] and must not be contradictory[50] or misleading.[51] The instructions must be applicable to, and warranted by, the pleadings and evidence,[52] and abstract instructions although statcarrier's liability for injury to the transported horses would be predicated on its duty as a common carrier, and it never sustained such relation as to the other horses.—Siegel v. Chicago, R I & P. Ry Co, 208 N.W. 78, 201 Iowa 712.

Care required of common carrier

(1) A charge stating that the evidence showed that the fire which destroyed plaintiff's goods while in possession of defendant carrier was started between 7 and 8 o'clock in the evening, that defendant was not required to take precaution against fire resulting from the riot till it could reasonably have anticipated danger to plaintiff's goods, but that, if the time came during the day or night in question that defendant could reasonably have anticipated such danger, then and only then it was required to exercise ordinary care in protecting the goods, was not subject to the exception that it limited the time during which defendant was required to exercise care to the time at which the fire started —Simmons Hardware Co. v Southern Ry. Co., C C.A Mo, 279 F. 929, certiorari denied 43 S Ct. 96, 260 U.S 739, 67 L.Ed. 490.

(2) In an interstate shipper's action against a carrier for injury to live stock by improper handling and delay, an instruction under Code Suppl.1913 § 2157s, that it was the duty of common carriers to move cars containing live stock at the highest practicable speed consistent with safety and, if defendant failed to do so, such failure would constitute negligence, was not erroneous as placing upon the carrier a higher degree of care than required in an interstate shipment—Bateham v. Chicago, M & St. P. Ry. Co, 192 N. W. 818, 195 Iowa 659.

(3) An instruction that, if the manifestations of mob violence were such as to induce a reasonably prudent person to believe that there was imminent danger of the destruction of property in the vicinity by mob violence, then it was the duty of a carrier to exercise ordinary care to preserve and protect shipments in cars in that vicinity, was erroneous by reason of the use of the word "imminent," because it was the duty of the carrier to exercise ordinary care for the protection of the property when it or its servants knew, or should have known, of such condition, although the danger was not "imminent," that is, near at hand, immediate, or impending—Julius Kessler & Co. v. Southern Ry. Co. in Kentucky, 255 S.W. 535, 200 Ky. 713.

(4) As it was carrier's duty under U S Comp.St. §§ 8651, 8652, to use ordinary care to provide properly equipped pens to hold horses while resting, there was no error in refusing its instruction that its only duty was to handle and care for them in removing from car, feeding, watering, and resting, with due care, skill, and diligence—Terrill v. Payne, 124 A. 462, 81 N.H 164

(5) In an action against a carrier for damages to shipment of cattle, the court's instruction that. "'Negligence' means that failure to exercise ordinary care. 'Ordinary care' means the doing of that which an ordinarily prudent man would do under the same or similar circumstances or not doing that which under the same or similar circumstances an ordinarily prudent man would not do"—as applied to handling of stock, is substantially correct.—Galveston, H & S. A Ry Co v. Harris Bros, Tex. Civ App, 211 S.W. 255, error refused.

Care required of private carrier

Plaintiff suing defendant as private carrier cannot complain of instruction that defendant was charged with ordinary care only.—Bloomberg-Michael Furniture Co v Urquhart, 143 S E 789, 38 Ga.App. 304.

Use of word "careless"

In action against carrier for injuries to mules in transit, instruction that common carrier is not an insurer of live stock received by it for transportation, but responsible only if careless and negligent, etc., was held improper, on account of the use of the word "careless"—Gulf, C. & S F. Instructions held misleading

(1) In an action for loss of a shipment destroyed by fire during a race riot, an instruction that, if manifestations of mob violence were such as to induce a reasonably prudent person to believe that there was danger of destruction of property, then it became the duty of the carrier and its agents to exercise ordinary care "in the use of the means and facilities at their command" to preserve and protect the property, was confusing when they had time and opportunity for wide discretion in the matter of precautions.—Julius Kessler & Co. v Southern Ry. Co. in Kentucky, 255 S W. 535, 200 Ky. 713

(2) In an action against carriers for damage to a shipment of potatoes, an instruction that it was the duty of the carrier to see that the car was properly ventilated, if it needed ventilation, to exercise reasonable care to keep the car ventilated, and to furnish a suitable car for the transportation of the particular class of goods intended to be shipped, held erroneous as misleading.—McNeill & Scott Co. v. Great Northern R. Co, 194 N.W 614, 156 Minn. 120.

(3) Where it was claimed that railroad cars were disinfected with a solution containing an excessive amount of cresol, a poison, but there was no claim that it was improper to apply it with a cup, or bucket, or to mix it with water without lime, an instruction that plaintiff had not shown how the solution should have been applied, and therefore the jury might not find that it was negligently applied, was properly refused, as it might have been misleading—Smith v. Payne, 206 P. 715, 60 Utah 89.

Instruction held not misleading

Where carriers, sued for damage to shipment of live stock, failed to relieve themselves from the presumption of negligence arising from the shippers' prima facie case, by failing to explain delays causing ninety hours to be consumed in a journey of about two hundred forty-eight miles, held, that the jury could not have been misled by a charge that the carriers would be liable if loss was proximately caused by the fact that they handled the shipment in an "unnecessarily and unusually rough manner" and "failed to transport them in a reasonable time"—Davis v. ing correct propositions of law as to the carrier's negligence, should not be given.[53] Hence an instruction authorizing recovery on an implied contract of carriage, where plaintiff pleads and proves an express contract,[54] or submitting the case on the theory of the carrier's common-law liability as insurer where the action is based on the carrier's negligence,[55] is improper. So instructions should not be given which ignore or exclude issues raised by the pleadings and evidence.[56] The instructions as to the carrier's negligence should not invade the province of the jury[57] as by assuming the existence of a material fact in issue.[58] Instructions as to presumptions and burden of proof with relation to the

Instructions held improper

(1) An instruction, in an action for negligent delay in delivering perishable goods, that the carrier must exercise ordinary care for the adoption of such means of transportation, and furnish such equipment as will accomplish that purpose, is erroneous, where there is nothing in the pleadings or evidence tending to show that proper equipment was not furnished.—Missouri Pac. (2) In action against carrier for loss from delay in transporting bananas, refusal of prayer authorizing finding that loss occurred because cars did not arrive in time for market on certain day was proper, in absence of any evidence that market price on day when goods arrived was lower than on day when they should have arrived.—Atlantic Fruit Co. v. (3) Where petition for loss of wheat in transit was grounded on carrier's negligence and not on contract, instruction, which was not hypothesized on negligence and peremptorily required finding for plaintiff if jury found that certain quantity of wheat was delivered to carrier and car on delivery to consignee contained a less amount, was erroneous.—Forest Green Farmers' Elevator Co. v Davis, 270 S W. 394, 216 Mo App. 545

(4) In a shipper's action against a carrier for damages to a shipment of hogs, submission of negligence on the carrier's part in failing to water the hogs was erroneous in view of the shipping contract which required the caretaker to look after that matter.—Panhandle & S F. (1) In an action against a railroad for damage to a shipment of sheep by delay, in view of the charge as a whole, special issue whether the sheep sustained damage as a proximate result of delays in transportation, which defendant railroad or any of its connecting carriers could have avoided by ordinary care, held not erroneous as assuming delays were caused by defendant's negligence.—Kansas City, M. & O. Ry. Co. v. Blackstone & Slaughter, Tex Civ. App., 217 S.W. 208, rehearing overruled 218 S.W. 552, error granted.

carrier's negligence are discussed infra subdivision f of this section.

c. Exceptions to Common-Law Liability

Proper instructions must be given with relation to loss or injury caused by an act of God, the inherent nature of the property, or the fault or negligence of the shipper.

The court must give correct instructions with relation to loss or injury falling within the exceptions to the carrier's common-law liability, such as an act of God,[59] the inherent nature of the the property transported,[60] or the fault or negligence of the shipper,[61] and such instructions negligence as the proximate cause, held not objectionable as assuming defendant's negligence in failing to bed the car.—Texas & P. Ry. Co v. Thorp, Tex.Civ.App., 198 S.W. 335.

Instruction held improper

In an action for injury to a shipment of seed, by reason of a flood during transit, an instruction that the carrier was liable in case the seed would not have been injured if the train had been kept in the railroad yard was properly refused, since the fact that, after the injury, it could be seen that it might have been avoided is no proof of negligence.—Feld v. Columbus & G. Ry. Co., 121 So. 272, 153 Miss. 601.

Affirmative defenses

The defenses available to carrier at common law in action for damage to goods while in transit, that damage was caused either by act of God, of public enemy, of shipper, or by inherent nature of the goods themselves, were affirmative defenses, and, in absence of affirmative evidence to that effect, trial court had duty to instruct jury that carrier had not met burden imposed on it—Southern Pac. Co. v. Itule, Ariz., 74 P.2d 38.

Instructions held erroneous

(1) Where the carrier pleaded that the injury to live stock was due to the vicious propensities of the stock or to the fault of the owner, an instruction which in effect told the jury to find for plaintiff if they found that the injury was caused by the combination of the natural propensities of the stock with the fault of the owner in failing properly to bed the stock and in overloading the car, was erroneous.—Morrow v. Wabash R. Co., Mo.App., 289 S.W. 343.

(2) Instructions relieving carrier from liability if hogs became sick from exposure were properly refused, where carrier's negligence could have combined with weather to cause loss.—Vaughn v. St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co., 15 S.W.2d 901, 223 Mo App. 732.

Defining "inherent vice" in animal

An instruction that "inherent vice" in an animal is some quality or characteristic of the animal that brings about its own injury or destruction, without fault on the part of any other supervening cause, was in the main correct, and no probable error was shown by its submission.—Texas & P Ry. Co. v Prunty, 233 S W. 625, 111 Tex. 162, conforming to answer to certified questions, Sup., 230 S.W. 396.

Instructions held erroneous

(1) In an action against a railroad company for damages to goods and merchandise set on fire, while being unloaded, by sparks from a passing locomotive, instructions that plaintiff could not recover if he, or his agent in charge of the unloading, knew of the danger and probability of destruction from the emission of sparks and negligently failed to extinguish them, held erroneous, as not drawing a distinction between goods which were destroyed before such sparks could have been extinguished by the exercise of ordinary diligence, and such goods as were thereafter destroyed, and as not confining the defense to such goods as were destroyed after the failure of the plaintiff to extinguish the fire—Mount v. Louisville & N. R. Co., C.C.A.Ala., 287 F 617.

(2) Charge that carrier cannot complain of shipper's failure to load machinery, as required by law, if it examined and approved loading, was erroneous as precluding the carrier from relying on contributory negligence as a defense.—St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co. v. Glow Electric Co, 172 N.E 425, 35 Ohio App. 291

(3) Refusal of instructions for failure to negative contributory fault of the carrier and to set out carrier's liability as insurer was held proper—Atlantic Coast Line Ry. v. Enterprise Cotton Oil Co., 74 So. 232, 199 Ala. 57.

Instruction held not erroneous

An instruction, directing recovery for a shipper for damage to goods during shipment because of the leaky car in which it was shipped, was not erroneous as modified to deny recovery if the jury found the plaintiff knew of the leaky condition of the car, but was favorable to plaintiff for omitting the element of exercise of due care by plaintiff to observe the condition of the car in which the goods were loaded before they were tendered for shipment—Schreiber Milling & Grain Co v. Chicago Great Western R. Co, Mo App., 246 S W. 647.

Duty to charge

(1) Where, in an action for damages for loss of stock, contributory negligence of plaintiff is pleaded and evidence received tending to support the allegation, it is the duty of the court, upon its own motion, to instruct the jury on the law of contributory negligence, and it is error to refuse a request of defendant thereon.—Johnson v. Payne, 191 N.W. 696, 109 Neb 531.

(2) Refusal to submit the question of whether plaintiff overloaded the live stock was error, where there was evidence of such overloading—Panhandle & S. F. R. Co. v. Sanderson, Tex.Civ App., 218 S.W. 540.

Failure to charge not error

Failure to instruct on shipper's duty under the contract to care for cattle because of having sent an attendant with the cattle, and that the carrier would not be liable for delays caused by the fault of the attendant, was not error, where the carrier waived the provision of the contract and assumed the duty of caring for the cattle—Baker v. Nance Bros., Tex.Civ.App., 294 S.W. 290.

Construction of charge

In an action for injuries to cattle before being unloaded on arrival at destination, where the carrier pleaded contributory negligence of the shipper in failing to remove the stock already unloaded from the receiving pens, a charge submitting to the jury the effect of an agreement by the carrier's conductor to give the shipper a reasonable time to procure horses and men to hold the stock already unloaded, so as to empty the pen, was evidently not drawn to submit the issue of contributory negligence, but to submit the shipper's excuse relieving him from the charge of negligence.—Davis v. Simmons, Tex.Civ.App., must be confined to the pleadings and evidence.[62] In an action for loss of an animal killed in transit, an instruction limiting defendant's exemptions from liability to the inherent vice or vicious propensities of the animal was not erroneous, where no other exemptions, such as those arising from an act of God, or the public enemy, or the shipper's fault, were invoked by defendant.[63]

Proximate cause of loss or injury. Where the carrier relies as a defense on one of the exceptions to its common-law liability, proper instructions should be given on the issue of proximate cause,[64] unless unwarranted by the evidence.[65] In an action for damage to goods by delay in transportation, an instruction to find for the carrier only if the bad condition of the goods when delivered to it, due to excessive rains, moisture, and exposure, was the "sole" cause of its damaged condition, was correct, the carrier being liable for damage resulting from its negligence, concurring with an act of God or other cause.[66] So, in an action for injury to goods in transit by reason of a flood, an instruction as to the carrier's liability in case the damage was caused by an act of God, requiring it to be the immediate, proximate, and sole cause of the damage, not concurred in by the negligence of the carrier, was proper.[67]

240 S.W. 970, dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

"Acts" of shipper

Since all acts of a shipper do not relieve a carrier from liability, an instruction that a carrier, sued for loss of a hog, should not be held liable if its death was due to an act of plaintiff shipper, was erroneous, as excusing the carrier from liability if its death was due to any act of the shipper.—Browning v. Wells Fargo & Co. Express, Mo.App., 243 S.W 190.

62. U.S.—Mount v. Louisville & N. R. Co, C.C.A.Ala., 287 F. 617

Instruction warranted by evidence

(1) Instruction that carrier was not liable if shipment was damaged while being transferred by plaintiff or its agent from one car to another was justified by evidence showing that defendant's consignor transhipped the goods to plaintiff.—Michellod v. Oregon-Washington R. & Nav. Co., 168 P. 620, 86 Or. 329.

(2) Instruction that railroads were not liable for injury to cattle shipment from act of God held proper under evidence.—International & G. N. R. Co. v. Barnes Bros, 294 S.W. 349, affirmed Barnes Bros. v. International & G. N. R. Co., Com.App., 1 S.W 2d 273.

(3) Instructions to find for carrier, if damage to strawberries resulted from inherent infirmity was not erroneous as abstract.—H Rouw Co. v American Ry Express Co, 291 S.W. 1001, 173 Ark. 84.

(4) Other instructions warranted by the evidence.—W. E. Neal & Son v Panhandle & S. F. Ry Co., Tex. Civ.App., 245 S.W. 452.

Instruction not warranted by evidence

(1) In an action for damages to household goods and merchandise destroyed by fire while being unloaded from a car, where the evidence showed that the initial fire had been apparently completely extinguished, and plaintiff's testimony tended to substantiate his theory that the subsequent fire was caused from an unperceived part of the initial fire, and there was no evidence from which it could be inferred that plaintiff was negligent in not extinguishing the fire, instructions predicated on such negligence were erroneous, as not supported by the evidence.—Mount v. Louisville & N. R Co, C.C.A.Ala., 287 F. 617.

(2) Refused instruction to find for defendants if plaintiff's negligence contributed to damage, although defendants were also negligent, held properly refused, as not based on evidence.—Seaboard Air Line Ry. Co v. J. E. Bowden & Co., 131 S.E. 245, 144 Va. 154

(3) In action against common carrier of goods by motor vehicle for loss of oriental rug in transit, where rug was seen by carrier's manager, was shipped with other household goods without concealment, and no inquiry was made as to its value, shipper could not be held guilty of fraud, and refusal to instruct on alleged fraud was proper.—Shikany v. Salt Creek Transp. Co., 45 P.2d 645, 48 Wyo. 190.

Instructions not warranted by pleadings

(1) The issue of failure of the caretakers properly to look after cattle shipped was not raised where, although the railway pleaded specially the stipulations of the shipping contract obligating the shipper to attend and take care of his cattle, there was no allegation of breach of this condition, nor any charge of contributory negligence in this respect and hence a special instruction on such issue was properly refused.—Galveston, H & S. A. Ry. Co v. Buck, 230 S.W. 891.

(2) Carrier's instruction predicated upon shipper's fraud in representing value of intra-state shipment was properly refused, where fraud was not alleged.—Chesapeake & O. Ry. Co. v. Osborne, 153 S.E. 865, 154 Va. 477.

65. Md.—Atlantic Fruit Co. v. Pennsylvania R Co, 130 A. 63, 147 Md 1.

Instruction on contributory negligence as proximate cause held unnecessary

In action for loss in shipment of bananas, instruction that, if loss was caused by negligence of agent sent with shipment by shipper in failing to regulate temperature properly, causing bananas to ripen too soon, there could be no recovery, was held not erroneous, notwithstanding there was no requirement for jury to find such negligence was proximate cause or was not negatived by existence of concurring negligence, proximate cause and concurring negligence being inapplicable under the evidence.—Atlantic Fruit Co. v Pennsylvania R. Co., 130 A. 63, 147 Md. 1.

d. Contractual Limitation of Liability

The sufficiency of instructions with respect to limitations of the carrier's liability contained in the contract of shipment is governed by the general rules.

The jury are entitled to correct instructions on the issues arising under a contract limiting the common-law liability of the carrier,[68] and this applies to limitations as to the value of the property,[69] and to provisions requiring notice of the claim or injury.[70]

e. Damages

Correct instructions as to damages for loss of, or injury to, property transported must be given, and their propriety and sufficiency are governed by the rules applicable to civil actions generally.

It is the duty of the court to instruct the jury as to the proper basis upon which the damages are to be ascertained;[71] but where the damages sought are the difference in the market value of the property at destination in the condition delivered and the condition when properly delivered it is not necessary to charge on the measure of damages, it being sufficient for the court simply to submit to the jury a special issue calling for that difference in value.[72] The instructions given or offered must, of course, correctly state the law relating to the elements and measure of damages,[73] and instructions

68. Tex.—Panhandle & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Sanderson, Civ.App., 218 S.W. 540 dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

Instructions held proper

(1) Where a special contract exempted the carrier from liability for loss or injury resulting from the nature of, or inherent vice in, the property, unless caused in whole or in part by its negligence, an instruction that the carrier did not insure that perishable goods would reach their destination in good condition, and was bound only to exercise reasonable care, was proper.—Peninsula Produce Exch. v. American Ry. Express Co., 128 A. 403, 147 Md. 424.

(2) Where carrier set up special contract limiting liability, instructions as to recovery if contract was voluntarily made by shipper, and vice versa, were held sufficient.—Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Mattingly, 119 N.E. 498, 69 Ind.App. 166.

(3) Instruction that limitation of liability is no defense of loss was caused by carrier's wanton or gross negligence, was held authorized by the evidence.—Kingsbury v. Chicago & A. R. Co., 213 Ill.App. 439.

Instructions properly refused

(1) Where a shipping contract provided that in case an employee of the shipper accompanied live stock, the carrier should not be liable for any defective ventilation, an instruction requiring verdict for carrier if shipper or attendant, after drop in temperature en route, failed to notify carrier of injuries and request repair of broken window, was properly refused as not justified by the contract.—Green v. American Ry. Express Co., Mo.App., 34 S.W.2d 1039.

(2) Magistrate's refusal to charge stipulation on back of bill of lading referring to cases in which carrier would not be liable was held justified, the cases being grouped together.—Ward v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 151 S.E. 904, 155 S.C. 54.

69. Mo.—Green v. American Ry. Express Co., App., 34 S.W.2d 1039.

Instruction held erroneous

In action by intra-state shipper of a stallion in Kansas, under the declared valuation on which the rate was based, an instruction was erroneous which submitted to the jury the question of whether the shipper knowingly accepted the reduced rate based on the declared value, the shipper's knowledge of the lawful rate being conclusively presumed by Kansas law, which controlled.—Strother v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co., Mo.App., 212 S.W. 404.

Instruction properly refused

Testimony of carrier's agent that owners' agent stated that amount obviously less than real value of property destroyed was sufficient valuation tended at most to prove a contract for relief against the carrier's common-law liability, contrary to the constitution, and did not warrant instruction that owners were estopped to claim more.—A. Arnold & Son Transfer & Storage Co. v. Weisiger, 6 S.W.2d 1034, 224 Ky. 659.

70. S.C.—Allen v. Davis, 118 S.E. 614, 125 S.C. 256.

Reasonable time for delivery as fixing time for notice

(1) An instruction that the jury should determine what was a reasonable time for delivery by a carrier, as bearing on the time for giving notice of claim under the conditions existing at the time of the shipment of the goods, was not erroneous, there being some evidence as to such conditions.—American Ry. Express Co. v. Roberts, 111 S.E. 744, 28 Ga.App. 510.

(2) An instruction to the effect that, under a provision of a bill of lading requiring claims for failure to deliver to be made in writing within six months after reasonable time for delivery had elapsed, a reasonable time for delivery is not considered to have elapsed until after carrier has been unable to trace or has abandoned a search for the undelivered freight, was erroneous as making reasonable time dependent on carrier's action and as being a charge on the facts.—Allen v. Davis, 118 S.E. 614, 125 S.C. 256.

Waiver of notice

Where contract for shipment of live stock required notice of claim for loss or injury to be given before removal, etc., instruction that if defendant waived its right to notice before stock was removed by its failure after notice to attempt to examine stock, etc., plaintiff could recover was error.—Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co. v. Brightwell, 162 P. 484, 62 Okl. 149.

Knowledge of carrier as equivalent to notice

In an action for damage to live stock, an instruction that if defendant, within the time fixed by the contract for giving notice of damage, had knowledge of the damage, then, as a matter of law, the provision as to notice was complied with was improper.—Newman v. Union Pac. R. Co., 210 Ill.App. 13.

71. Tex.—Texas & P. Ry. Co. v. Bufkin, Civ.App., 19 S.W.2d 343.

Instructions must give jury guide or chart by which to measure damages.—Texas & P. Ry. Co. v. Bufkin, Tex.Civ.App., 20 S.W.2d 1119.—Texas & P. Ry. Co. v. Bufkin, Tex.Civ.App., 19 S.W.2d 343.

Basis for computing damages specified in contract for interstate shipment is subject to modification, and carrier is entitled to submission of case in harmony with rules of interstate commerce commission.—Shier v. American Ry. Express Co., 208 N.W. 746, 234 Mich. 505.

Instructions held proper

(1) In an action for damages to corn because mixed with coal dust in shipment, an instruction, that the measure of damages was the difference between the fair and reasonable market value in clean condition at the time and place of delivery and its fair and reasonable market value at the same time and place in the condition in which delivered, was not erroneous as authorizing the assessment of special damages without showing notice of the special contract of sale, the fact that the sale price and market price were the same not changing the character of the damages from general to special.—Director General of Railroads v. A. C Schuff & Co., 237 S W. 410, 193 Ky. 737.

(2) Nor was such instruction erroneous as omitting to direct attention specifically to the part of the corn injured when delivered to the original purchaser, who refused to accept it on account of the coal dust, there being no evidence of negligence in handling the corn or adding injury thereafter.—Director General of Railroads v. A. C. Schuff & Co, supra.

(3) Instruction that measure of damages for injuries to live stock in transit was difference between reasonable market value at point of destination when they should have been delivered there, and such value at place where delivered and sold by plaintiffs, less expense of transporting them to destination, was not error as directing deduction of cost of transportation from reasonable market value at place of delivery.—Morrow v. Wabash Ry Co, 276 S.W. 1030, 220 Mo App. 518.

(4) In an action for damages to cattle during shipment, where the evidence showed that the cattle were weak and impoverished when shipped, charges by the court limiting the liability of defendant to damages resulting from the negligence of the carriers, and excluding all injuries or damages resulting from the condition of the cattle when shipped, were held to submit to the jury the correct basis upon which to estimate the damages for loss or injury to that class of cattle—Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. Galveston H. & S. A Ry. Co., Tex.Com App, 239 S W. 919, reversing Galveston, H & S. A. Ry. Co. v. Hartford Fire Ins Co., Civ.App, 220 S.W. 781.

(5) Such charges were not erroneous as authorizing recovery for damages to which the carriers' negligence may have in any wise contributed, although in submitting the defensive issues growing out of the weakness and poverty of the cattle the court stated the carriers were not liable for damages not caused or contributed to by their negligence.—Hartford Fire Ins Co v. Galveston, H & S. A. Ry. Co, supra.

(6) In an action against a carrier for damages to cattle by delay, where there was evidence that a train wreck, and consequent delay and confinement for twelve hours, caused depreciation, an instruction that the plaintiff was entitled to recover for this element of damages was proper, although he was able to sell immediately upon arrival—Gulf, C & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Rodriquez, Tex Civ.App., 185 S W. 311.

(7) Instruction as to carrier's liability for injury to car of mustard greens was held not objectionable as authorizing damages for natural deterioration.—Rio Grande & E P. Ry Co. v T. A Austin & Co., Tex Civ App., 12 S W.2d 1070, reversed on another ground, Com App, 25 S.W.2d 306

(8) In a suit for injury to live stock in transit, a charge to consider the extent of recovery of the cattle from their injuries, and if recovery was complete, to find for the carrier, is not objectionable as confining consideration to complete recovery.—Panhandle & S F. Ry. Co. v. Norton, Tex Civ App., 188 S W. 1011.

Instructions held erroneous

(1) Instruction in shipper's action that damages for lost and damaged hogs were difference in value when delivered by and returned to consignors was held erroneous—Gillette v. St. Louis-San Francisco Ry Co, Mo.App., 24 S W.2d 1050.

(2) Instruction on measure of damages for injuries to animals sold at way point was held erroneous as not requiring finding that they had to be sold there because so badly injured that shipment could not be continued, in view of conflicting evidence as to extent of injury—Morrow v Wabash Ry. Co, 276 S.W. 1030, 220 Mo.App. 518.

(3) In an action against a transfer company for damages to household goods, an instruction that the measure of damages was the reasonable market value of the goods damaged and the usual value of the labor and material necessary to repair the same together with the difference between the reasonable market value of the goods just before the damage and just after the repair was made was erroneous as in effect authorizing a recovery for the value of the goods plus the difference between the market value before the damage and after the repair—Empire Transfer & Storage Co. v. Botte, Tex Civ App., 232 S W. 347

(4) Instruction that measure of damages for cattle that died as result of carrier's negligence was their intrinsic value at destination on day cattle were shipped, was erroneous, where it was not shown that cattle had no market value, and only proof of intrinsic value was incompetent testimony of shipper.—Wichita Valley Ry. Co. v Turbeville, Tex.Civ. App., 269 S.W. 498.

(5) In action for injury to live stock shipment, a requested instruction requiring a finding that there was no decline in market value of sheep, when there was such evidence as to either ewes or lambs, is erroneous, since the term "sheep" includes ewes and lambs—Panhandle & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Bell, Tex Civ App, 189 S.W. 1097.

(6) Instruction that the measure of damages for injuries to live stock was the difference between the market value of the stock as it should have arrived and as it did arrive, was erroneous, if there was no market value at the place of destination—Missouri, etc, R. Co. v. Mulkey, Tex.Civ App., 159 S W. 111.

(7) Other instructions held erroneous.—Panhandle & S. F Ry Co v. Parrish, Tex.Civ.App., 281 S.W 887—Rio Grande, E P & S. F R Co. v. Kraft & Madero, Tex.Civ App, 212 S W. 981, dismissed for want of jurisdiction—Panhandle & S. F Ry. Co. v. Brown, Tex.Civ.App, 198 S. W. 172.

Definition of terms

In action for damage to stock shipment caused by carrier's delay, instructions as to damages should have defined shrinkage for which plaintiff could recover, some shrinkage naturally occurring on such a shipment.—Baker v. Bush, Mo App., 194 S.W. 1061.

Punitive damages

In action against carrier, instruction which authorized jury to adjudge punitive damages if carrier's failure to perform its public duties was "reckless" or wanton, or grossly negligent, or willful, was not erroneous on ground that "reckless" means no more than simple negligence, since word imports heedless which erroneously limit the damages to which plaintiff is entitled,[74] or, on the other hand, are so framed as to permit recovery for items which are not proper elements of damage,[75] should not be given. The instructions as to damages should be complete,[76] and not misleading.[77] They must also be confined to the issues raised by the pleadings and proof,[78] and must not ignore or exclude ma-indifference to consequences, "recklessness" being synonymous with "gross negligence"—Tri-State Transit Co v Gay, Miss, 172 So. 742

Instruction held misleading

In shipper's action for damages to cattle shipped, where the railway's right to have the jury exclude from the amount of damages found the usual and ordinary losses from shipment or those resulting from the condition of the cattle was safeguarded by the general charge, the carrier was not entitled further to a specific instruction, which required the jury to find no damages whatever if they should believe that the injuries to the cattle were caused in part by impoverished condition of the cattle unless they could separate such damages from those accruing from the negligence of the carrier; for in such a case the jury were not required to be able to "separate" damages caused by negligence from those resulting from other causes, as that term would ordinarily be understood by a jury, so that the requested instruction was incorrect and misleading—Galveston, H & S. A Ry Co. v. Buck, Tex.Civ App, 230 S.W. 891.

Instructions held not misleading

(1) In action for damage to goods in transit, instruction to allow difference between what they "would have brought in open market" on day of arrival at destination, had they arrived in good condition, and reasonable market value in damaged condition, was not misleading nor prejudicial to defendant, if technically erroneous—American Fruit Growers v. St. Louis, B & M. Ry. Co, Mo.App., 261 S.W 949, certiorari denied St. Louis, B. & M. R. Co. v American Fruit Growers, 45 S.Ct 94, 266 U.S 611, 69 L.Ed 467.

(2) In action for death of cattle from injuries received in transportation, an instruction as to measure of damages to be adopted "if you find that the defendant G. Railway Company or its connecting carriers were guilty of negligence, and that the plaintiff has been damaged as alleged," was not misleading as against contention that it did not confine jury to specific acts of negligence alleged, the words "as alleged" having reference "to the matter of negligence and damages"—Gulf, C. & S F Ry. Co v. Morris, Tex Civ App, 241 S.W. 235, affirmed, Com.App, 250 S.W 1017.

(3) In an action against a carrier for damage to cattle by delay an instruction that plaintiff might recover for extra shrinkage and bad appearance was not improper as misleading in mixing two elements of damage, since they are so nearly similar in character as to be substantially a common cause of loss.—Gulf, C & S F Ry Co. v. Instructions held not warranted by evidence

(1) Where, in shipper's action for damages to cattle, three of which died, evidence showed that death of one of them was not attributable to the fault of defendant, instruction authorizing recovery for death of three cattle was broader than the evidence.—Sandker v. Wabash Ry Co, Mo App., 267 S.W 957.

(2) Where the cattle for the injury to which a suit was brought against a carrier were transported in eight separate shipments, and plaintiff introduced evidence by the caretakers in charge of some, but not all, of the shipments as to the depreciation in value of the particular shipment in charge of the witnesses, some of whom, however, did not qualify as knowing the market value at the place of destination, a charge that, if any of the cattle delivered alive at the point of destination were injured or damaged, and depreciated in value by the negligence of the carriers, to find for the plaintiff damages measured by the difference between the market value of such cattle in the condition in which they were delivered and in the condition they should and would have been delivered, was without sufficient basis in the evidence, and the giving thereof was reversible error—Hartford Fire Ins. Co v. Galveston, H. & S. A. Ry. Co., Tex Com. App, 239 S.W 919, reversing Galveston, H. & S A. Ry Co. v. Hartford Fire Ins. Co., Civ App., 220 S.W. 781.

Failure to confine recovery to issues

In action against carrier for loss of wheat in transit, instruction which failed to limit recovery to amount of wheat claimed to have been lost as shown by pleadings and evidence was erroneous, jury being authorized thereby to go beyond petition and proof.—Forest Green Farmers' Elevator Co. v. Davis, 270 S.W. 394, 216 Mo.App. 545.

terial issues or evidence from the consideration of the jury.[79] If the market value of live stock is shown by the evidence to exceed the value alleged in the petition, the court should instruct that the recovery for loss of, or injury to the stock could not exceed the amount claimed in the petition.[80]

Double damages. An instruction which is so framed as to authorize the recovery of double damages for injury to property transported is erroneous [81]

Apportionment of damages. Where the carrier's negligence contributed to the loss or injury, an instruction which permits the jury to apportion the damages if the loss was caused by an act of God,[82] or the negligence of the shipper,[83] is erroneous.

f. Presumptions and Burden of Proof

The general rules relating to instructions in civil actions are applicable to instructions as to presumptions and burden of proof in actions against carriers for loss of, or injury to, property.

The instructions as to presumptions and burden of proof in an action against a carrier for loss of, or injury to, property in its possession must, as in other civil actions, be sufficient in substance and form[84] and it is error to refuse a proper instruction;[85] but instructions which are misleading or confusing,[86] or ignore issues which there is evi-

Instructions held proper

(1) In an action against a carrier for damages to a shipment of cattle through delay in transit occasioned in part by a blizzard and in part because of insufficient motive power, an instruction that the burden is on defendant to prove the necessity of detaching the engine by reason of storm, and of proving that the injury was solely the result of an act of God and to prove the negligence of defendant, and that his damage was occasioned therefrom, was not erroneous.—McKinley v. Hines, 215 P. 301, 113 Kan. 550.

(2) Failure to instruct that plaintiff has burden of proving carrier's negligence concurred with act of God was not error, where carrier's evidence tended to show such negligence.—Ford v Wabash Ry. Co, 300 S.W 769, 318 Mo. 723, affirming, App., 266 S.W. 1032.

Instructions held improper

(1) In an action for damages to shipment of eggs wherein the evidence failed to show the extent of such damage, it was error to instruct that the burden was on defendant to prove the value of the eggs partially destroyed.—Southern Express Co. v. Bass, 102 S.E. 168, 24 Ga. App. 742

(2) Instruction placing burden on shipper of horses to show he notified carrier of broken windows and "requested" repair was held properly refused.—Green v. American Ry. Express Co., Mo App., 34 S W 2d 1039.

(3) In action against railroad for damage to shipment of tomatoes, instruction that railroad must show that damage was caused by inherent defect in the shipment, or by negligence of shipper, or by some other cause over which railroad had no control, in order not to be liable, was error, in view of rule in such cases that railroad need only satisfy jury that it handled the tomatoes in accordance with shipper's orders and in a reasonably prudent manner as to matters not covered by such orders.—Southern Pac. Co. v. Itule, Ariz, 74 P.2d 38.

(4) In action against railroad to recover value of stallion which died while in transportation, instruction which required railroad to show by preponderance of evidence that failure to transport horse to destination of shipment was not due to "any act or omission" upon its part was prejudicially erroneous, since instruction placed upon railroad a duty which is not imposed by law. —Vander Beek v. Chicago & N. W. Ry Co, Iowa, 278 N.W. 201.

Instruction erroneous in form

In action against carrier for injury to stock, charge that the burden is on plaintiff to "show or prove" that the carrier failed to deliver the stock within a reasonable time, instead of "reasonably satisfy," is bad in form and properly refused.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Kinney, 127 So. 804, 221 Ala. 136.

Ownership of property

In an action against a carrier for damages to a shipment of sheep, an instruction that it was "incumbent upon the plaintiffs to show ownership of the sheep" sufficiently charged that the burden was imposed upon plaintiffs to show ownership of the sheep in themselves before they were entitled to recover damages.—Cripe v. Davis, 214 P 343, 107 Or 142.

Delay causing injury

dence to support,[87] or place the burden of proof on the wrong party[88] are erroneous. So an instruction which places upon plaintiff a greater burden of proof than he is required by law to sustain is erroneous,[89] and an instruction which unduly minimizes the presumption of negligence arising from the fact that the carrier received perishable freight in good condition and delivered it at destination in bad condition is also erroneous.[90] The instructions must be applicable to and confined to the issues raised by the pleadings and evidence.[91] Where there was an issue under the pleadings and evidence as to whether the property was in good condition when delivered to the carrier for shipment, an instruction that the burden was on the carrier to show that the injury was caused by an excepted cause was properly refused.[92] So, where the shipper had introduced evidence that the goods were delivered to the carrier in good condition and arrived at destination in bad condition, it was not error to refuse an instruction placing on the carrier the burden of proving its freedom from negligence, plaintiff having based his action on specific acts of negligence.[93]

§ 260. Verdict and Findings

The rules as to verdicts and findings in civil actions generally are applicable in actions against carriers for loss of, or injury to, property.

The rules applicable to the verdict and findings in civil actions generally apply to actions against carriers for loss of, or injury to, property transported. The verdict or findings are insufficient if they are uncertain or ambiguous,[94] or are unsupported by the pleadings and evidence.[95] Special issues may be submitted to the jury when properly raised by the pleadings and supported by the evidence;[96] but it is not error to refuse to submit

Refusal of instruction that condition of strawberries at destination was presumably caused by carrier's negligence was not error, in view of evidence of inherent infirmity.—H. Rouw Co v American Ry Express Co, 291 S.W 1001, 173 Ark. 84.

Erroneous instructions

(1) Instruction placing burden of showing lack of negligence on carriers, in action for injury to stock by sickness, was error where shipper sued on theory that carrier was insurer, and did not allege any specific act of negligence.—Vaughn v. St Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co., 15 S W.2d 901, 223 Mo.App. 732.

(2) In action for loss of, and injury to, cattle when car containing them was burned on a siding alleged to have been caused by sparks from a passing engine, where the action was heard on the issue of negligence, it was reversible error to instruct, as to the negligence alleged, if it was found the cattle were injured in defendant's custody, the burden was on it to exculpate itself; that in shipments of live stock the burden is on defendant to show injuries in transportation were not caused by its negligence.—Austin v. Seaboard Air Line Ry., 121 S.E. 1, 187 N C. 7

(3) Charge putting burden of showing freedom from negligence on carrier was error, where evidence made question of whether damage to shipment was due to inherent infirmity of fruit one for jury.—Galveston, H. & S A. Ry. Co v. Licata, Tex Com App, 280 S W 540, reversing, Civ.App., 269 S.W. 821

Findings as to value

In a shipper's action against a railroad company for the value of hogs escaped from the railway stock pen because of the negligent maintenance of the stock pen, a judgment for plaintiff must be reversed in the absence of evidence to support a finding as to the value of the hogs sued for.—St. Louis Southwestern Ry Co. of Texas v. Brown & Co., Tex.Civ.App., 248 S.W. 97.

96. Tex.—Texas & New Orleans Ry. Co. v. Booth, Civ.App, 99 S.W.2d 430, error dismissed

Issues held properly submitted

(1) In shipper's action against carrier for damage to cattle in transit, two separate special issues as to whether cars were properly bedded and whether there were cracks in floors of cars permitting bedding to sift out as cars were jostled and moved along were held properly submitted.—Texas & New Orleans Ry. Co. v. Booth, Tex.Civ App., 99 S.W. 2d 430, error dismissed.

the defense that the shipper failed to unload cattle after a sudden stop, in an effort to diminish or mitigate the damages, where there is no definite evidence that the unloading of the cattle would have resulted in any material benefit to them, or that any definite injury, which could be measured in dollars, properly resulted by failure to unload.[97] Findings which are inconsistent with each other,[98] or with the general verdict,[99] are also insufficient. Where the findings are inconsistent with the general verdict the court should render judgment on the findings, notwithstanding the general verdict;[1] and where the jury find generally for plaintiff, but specially find that the carrier's negligence consisted in something not charged in the petition, it is the duty of the court to render judgment for plaintiff.[2]

A finding of the jury as to the amount of damages warranted by the pleadings and evidence should be included in the verdict, although not mentioned in the court's charge.[3]

Construction and effect. The construction and effect of the findings are governed by the general rules.[4] A general verdict for the carrier in an action for injuries to live stock is a finding against negligence of the carrier.[5]

A clerical error in a finding as to the date agreed upon for delivery of the goods is rendered immaterial by another finding which states such date correctly.[6]

Mere surplusage in a finding will be disregarded.[7]

(2) Carrier being prohibited by Rev.St. art 708 from limiting liability, charge submitting special issue whether cattle were injured by reason of car floor not being bedded was proper, over objections that shipper was required by shipping contract to inspect car and that he knew car was not bedded—Houston & T. C. Ry. Co. v. Claybrook, Tex. Civ.App., 271 S.W. 195.

Sufficiency of issue presented

In an action for damage to goods in shipment where the charge clearly presented question whether the carrier was negligent, whether the negligence was the proximate cause of the injury, and the amount of damages, the simple issue whether defendant was indebted to plaintiff, and if so in what amount, was sufficient—Bivens Bros. v Atlantic Coast Line R. Findings held inconsistent

(1) Finding that injuries to live stock shipped were contributed to by disposition of animals, and further finding that disposition of animals did not cause injuries, were conflicting—Panhandle & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Key, Tex.Civ.App., 20 S.W.2d 260.

(2) In action against express companies for negligence, a finding by the jury that the S. Company, which transported the butter, is not liable for the loss, is inconsistent with a finding that the A. Company, which was organized subsequently to the loss and succeeded to the business of the S. Company, is liable, and cannot support a judgment against the A. Company—King Grocery Co. v. Particular findings construed

(1) In an action for the loss of goods shipped under a bill of lading requiring suits to be brought within two years and one day after the expiration of a reasonable time for delivery, the trial court's finding that a reasonable time for delivery would surely be considerably less than six months must be construed as allowing six months when no other time was specifically named.—Humphrey-Cornell Co. v. Hines, 115 A. 561, 97 Conn. 21.

(2) The jury's answer to the question whether notice of the claim for damages to cattle was given before they were removed from the station, "Yes, after the cattle were sold, but we don't know whether the cattle were removed or not," is equivalent to a finding that notice was not given before the cattle were removed—Atchison, etc., R. Co. v. Means, 80 P. 604, 71 Kan. 845, 846.

(3) Finding that injury to live stock from making a flying switch, whereby cars were shunted against a loaded car on a siding, was result of gross negligence, in absence of any evidence of exceptional circumstances, does not imply that injury was intentional or wanton, so as to take case out of valid shipping contract limiting liability for negligence.—Kennedy v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 179 P. 314, 104 Kan. 129, 368, motion granted 181 P. 117, 104 Kan. 708.

Finding nonexistence of contract

A finding that a live stock shipper did not enter into a contract with the carrier was mere surplusage, the liability of the carrier being the same regardless of such contract—Bryan v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 93 S.E. 750, 174 N.C. 177.

§ 261. Judgment

The judgment must be supported by the findings. Under some circumstances the carrier will be permitted to keep the property damaged.

In accordance with the general rule, the judgment in an action against a carrier for loss of, or injury to, property transported must be supported by the findings;[8] and a finding by the jury that an unprecedented storm caused the loss, and that defendant was negligent, but that the negligence did not proximately cause the loss, precludes a judgment for plaintiff, except for the amount admitted to be due.[9]

Relief to defendant. In a shipper's action for damage to property, where plaintiff recovers the value thereof preceding shipment, the carrier will be permitted to keep the property, so that it may get the benefit of its value, if any.[10]

§ 262. Damages

The general rules affecting the measure and elements of damages are applicable in actions against carriers for injury to, or loss of, property in course of transportation.

§ 263. Measure and Elements in General

A carrier is liable, in case of loss of, or injury to, property, for all damages proximately caused by its breach of duty or negligence, but for nothing more. The damages should not be excessive.

The general rule is that, in case of loss of, or injury to, property, the carrier is liable for all damages proximately resulting from the carrier's breach of duty or of special contract, or due to its negligence,[11] to be ascertained according to the ordinary rules of evidence,[12] but for nothing beyond this.[13] Obviously, no damages should be allowed

Full compensation

(1) Full compensation for loss or damage may be recovered by shipper —Woonsocket Machine & Press Co v. New York, N. H. & H. R Co., 131 N.E. 461, 239 Mass. 211.

(2) A common carrier is subject to common law of full liability for actual value of undelivered intrastate shipment, lost by reason of robbery, in absence of special agreement limiting his liability —Reich v. McGill, 196 A. 651, 119 N.J Law 358.

(3) Where carload of potatoes, shipped in charge of shipper's agent, under bill of lading, providing that carrier would not be liable for loss or damage unless caused by negligence of carrier, was destroyed by fire, not caused by carrier, and plaintiff, in action to recover for loss, relied solely on failure to furnish adequate fire protection, and failure to exercise due diligence in using such equipment, recovery, if any, should be limited to loss sustained after discovery of such fire—John Groves Co. v Bangor & A. R Co., 129 A. 823, 124 Me. 373.

Use for which shipment intended

In applying measure of damages recoverable from railroad for injuries to shipment in transit, regard must be had to use and purpose for which shipment is intended.— Schwalb v Erie R. Co., 293 N.Y.S 842, 161 Misc. 743—Perkel v Pennsylvania R. Co., 265 N.Y.S 597, 148 Misc. 284

Failure to recondition goods

Where shipment of shoes in interstate commerce was damaged by unprecedented flood, carrier was not liable for failure to recondition shoes while in transit, where carrier did not have facilities to enable it to recondition shoes.—Baltimore & O R Co v. Johl & Bergman, Miss., 177 So 778.

Injury to live stock; failure to breed

Where, in an action against a carrier for damages to sheep before delivery to consignee, it appeared that the market value of the sheep was depreciated, because they would not breed on account of the injuries sustained, and such element of damage flowed directly from the injuries in question, compensation for the loss thereby sustained was properly allowed —Smith v. Hines, 196 P. 1032, 33 Idaho 582.

Replacement of damaged property

Where a carrier destroys live stock, it would not be compensation to give plaintiff other stock, since it would be difficult, if not impossible, to furnish just such cattle as were destroyed —International Harvester Co of America v Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co, 172 N.W 471, 186 Iowa 86.

Erroneous measure of damages

(1) Where a manufacturer of a particular type of machine, being unable to supply the demand, engaged another company to fabricate two hundred of the machines furnishing special prints, patterns, tools, etc.,

which are not authorized by the pleadings;[14] and, where plaintiff produces no evidence to show the proper measure of damages under the pleadings, a judgment for nominal damages is proper.[15] The carrier is liable for the full value of an intra-state shipment lost in transit, and in case of damage thereto is liable for the full amount of damage;[16] but a shipper who misrepresents the value of such shipment in order to obtain a lower freight rate is guilty of fraud which, at common law, estops him from asserting a different value when suing for loss or injury.[17] Damages occurring before the goods are received for transportation, or after delivery to the consignee, are, of course, not recoverable.[18]

A consignee who has only a qualified interest, as, for instance, a lien for advances, can recover only the value of such interest.[19]

Excessive damages. Whether or not the damages awarded are excessive depends on the facts of the particular case. In the notes cases are referred to in which certain awards were held excessive and others not excessive.[20]

§ 264. Value of Goods Lost or Depreciation in Value of Goods Injured

a. General rule

b. Extent and limits of rule in general and its own mechanical engineer to inspect the materials and workmanship, the amount paid such other company for each machine was not the measure of recovery against a carrier destroying two of the machines.—Baltimore & O. C. Terminal R. Co v. Becker Milling Mach. Co., C.C.A.Ill., 272 F. 933.

(2) Where an owner of a special type of machine, two of which were destroyed by a carrier, sold them through manufacturer's agents, who were either purchasers on their own account for resale at a uniform price, or selling agents on commission, such uniform selling price, without deduction of the selling cost, was not the measure of damages.—Baltimore & O. C. Terminal R. Co. v Becker Milling Mach. Co., supra.

Remote damages

Where carrier billed kerosene as gasoline, and represented that it was gasoline, causing consignee to unload it into tank with other gasoline and sell it as such, damage to business from refusal of purchasers and general public to deal further with plaintiff was not direct, natural, probable, and reasonable consequence of negligent act, and too remote and conjectural for recovery—Ohio West Virginia Co v. In suit for damages for injury to pecan trees from cold, while being held at defendant's depot, plaintiff's recovery was not limited to nominal damages where evidence showed market value of trees at point of destination and time of arrival and that after they were damaged by cold they were without value—American Ry. Delay in unloading

In a shipper's action against a carrier for damages to a shipment of strawberries, where there is evidence that part of the damages was due to delay in unloading after delivery to consignee, a recovery for the entire loss sustained by the shipper is not justified.—Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Plant City Growers' Ass'n, 82 So. 599, 78 Fla. 2.

(3) Where plaintiff paid $8 for extra feed and lost value of shrinkage, $116.15, and there was no evidence of other loss, judgment for shipper for $178.30 was excessive in sum of $54.15—Pittsburgh, C., C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Hughes, 131 N.E. 234, 76 Ind.App. 26.

(3) A verdict for $800 against an express company for loss of a jack killed in transit was not excessive, in view of testimony that it was reasonably worth from $1,000 to $1,300 at the place of destination—Ward v. American Ry. Express Co., Mo.App., 259 S.W. 514.

(4) In an action against a carrier for damage to horses and mules in transit, three mules, valued at $250 to $300 each, having died, and a depreciation in value of other mules from $40 to $60 each having been testified to, verdict for the shippers for $1,200 was not excessive.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hunter, 214 S.W. 914, 185 Ky. 165.

c. Where property has no market value
d. Where property has no market value at destination
e. Where property is shipped for sale or sold in transit for stipulated price

a. General Rule

The general rule is that the measure of damages for loss of property shipped is the market value at destination, and in case of injury, the difference between the value at the time and place of delivery in an uninjured condition and the value in the depreciated condition in which the property is actually delivered.

The criterion for determining the damages for loss of, or injury to, property in transit ordinarily is the market value at destination, if the property had a market value at that place,[21] and, where the original destination was changed by direction of the shipper, the market value at the new destination is the proper basis for estimating the damages;[22] but if the carrier is charged as warehouseman or bailee, the value of the property at the point of shipment would furnish the proper basis for estimating the damages.[23]

Where property is lost in transit, the general rule is that the carrier will be liable for its market value at the place of destination at the time when delivery should have been made,[24] less the unpaid freight charges as stated infra § 272.

Effect of Cummins Carmack amendments

(1) Under the Cummins-Carmack amendments to the Interstate Commerce Act, making carriers liable for the "full actual loss, damage, or injury" to property in transit, a carrier's liability for loss of property is the same as at common law, namely, the value of the property at destination at the time it should have been delivered.

U.S.—McCaull-Dinsmore Co. v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., D.C Minn., 252 F. 664, affirmed Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co. v. McCaull-Dinsmore Co., 260 F. 835, 171 C.C. A. 561, certiorari granted 40 S.Ct 219, 251 U.S 549, 64 L Ed. 409, and affirmed 40 S.Ct 504, 253 U S. 97, 64 L.Ed. 801.

(2) The measure of damages for loss of coal shipped to a retail dealer is the market value of the coal at the time and place of delivery, whether the consignee actually bought coal to replace it or not, and notwithstanding such value included an element of retail profit due to the absence of a wholesale market at that place.—Leominster Fuel Co. v. New York, N H. & H. R. Co., supra.

(3) Such profit is not recoverable as separate element of damages.—Leominster Fuel Co. v. New York, N. H. & H R Co., supra.

(4) Under the statute, the measure of damages recoverable by a dealer in coal who sold at both retail and wholesale for loss of a portion of a carload of coal was not his loss of profit, either retail or wholesale, where he had coal in storage ample for his business needs, but was his full actual loss, including cost of coal at mine, plus freight, if paid, and war tax, but not including any allowance for unloading, cartage, overhead, or profit—Brown Coal Co v. Illinois Cent R Co., 192 N.W 920, 196 Iowa 562

(5) Under the statute the damages recoverable for shortage in a shipment of coal intended to be added to a stock of coal for resale, was the wholesale market price where the shortage was capable of replacement and was in fact replaced, in the course of business, from purchases made in carload lots at the wholesale price without added expense.—Illinois Cent. R Co. v. Crail, Minn., 50 S.Ct. 180, 281 U.S. 57, 74 L.Ed. 699, 67 A.L R 1423, reversing, C.C. A., Crail v. Illinois Cent. R. Co, 13 F.2d 459, reversing, D C., 2 F.2d 287, and, C C.A., Illinois Cent. (6) Test of market value in determining damages recoverable for failure to deliver interstate shipment may be discarded, if inapplicable or not exact—Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Crail, supra.

(7) But it has been held that the "full actual loss" recoverable under the amendment is not limited to the value of the property at destination. U. S.—Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Crail, supra.

Bulk price

Damage for shortage in delivery of fungible goods, in the absence of special circumstances, is measured by the bulk price, both at common law and under the Uniform Sales Act § 44—Illinois Cent R. Co. v Crail, Minn, 50 S.Ct 180, 281 U S. 57, 74 L.Ed 699, 67 A.L R. 1423, reversing, C.C A., Crail v Illinois Cent. R Co., 13 F 2d 459, reversing, D C., 2 F.2d 287, and, C.C A, Illinois Cent. Place of destruction

In suit for damages for goods destroyed in transit, reasonable market value of particular articles destroyed at time and place of destruction was proper measure of damages—St Louis, S F. & T. Ry. Co. v. J. G Henderson Cut Stone Co., Tex Civ App, 275 S.W 603.

In absence of evidence of value at destination and objection by carriers, the value of cotton at point of origin of shipment on day of fire destroying cotton was proper measure of damages—Anderson, Clayton & Co. v Yazoo & M V. R. Co., 141 So 453, 174 La. 762.

Evidence not objected to

In an action to recover for shortage of coal delivered to consignee where there was no objection to the introduction of a freight bill and expense bill showing the weight of a car of coal, the court was justified in allowing the amount therein stated—Payne v White House Lumber Co, Tex.Civ.App., 231 S.W. 417.

Value on auction market

Actual loss which is sustained by plaintiff, whose shipment of goods is injured and which he is entitled to recover from railroad, is difference in value on auction market of shipment in condition in which it was tendered by railroad to plaintiff and in condition in which they were when shipped.—Schwalb v. Erie R. Co., 293 N.Y.S 842, 161 Misc. 743.

Where the property is rendered worthless by the injury, the measure of damages is the market value at time and place of tender.—St. Louis Southwestern Ry Co. of Texas v Hughston Grain Co., Tex.Civ. App., 186 S.W 429.

Neglect to protect shipment rejected by consignee

Consignor's damages for carrier's neglect to protect perishable shipment on consignor's rejection was difference in value at time carrier should have acted and sale.—Porter v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 231 N.Y.S 432, 224 App.Div. 440—Porter v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 215 N.Y.S. 727, 217 App Div 49.

Where carrier departs from method of shipment specified in contract, and the shipper seeks to recover damages done to the horses, and not the value of them, even if trover is the only remedy, the amount recoverable is the value of the horses when converted, less their value when redelivered to plaintiff.—McKahan v. American Express Co., 95 N.E. 785, 209 Mass. 270, 35 L.R.A.,N.S., 1046, Ann Cas 1912B 612.

Shrinkage and depreciation in market value are proper elements of damage for injury to live stock.—Panhandle & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Harp, Tex Civ App., 193 S.W. 438.

Physical injury caused by delay

(1) Measure of damages applied in actions for negligent injury while a consignment is in transit, which is the difference between market value of goods at time and place of delivery in an uninjured condition, and value in depreciated condition in which they were delivered, should be applied in an action for loss in quality and quantity in corn, alleged to be due to heating and spoiling because of delay in transit.—Mueller Grain Co v Lake Erie & W. R. Co., 213 Ill App. 108.

(2) The damage to live stock for delay in shipment is difference between market value of live stock in condition they were when delivered at destination and market value in condition they would have been in if delay had not occurred, rather than expense of reproducing weight lost, irrespective of whether live stock were intended to be immediately sold or to be kept for fattening.—Kurn v. Westheimer & Daube, Okl., 73 P 2d 835.

(3) If depreciated condition of stock resulted from carrier's delay in shipment, damages to shipper would be difference between market value at time of actual sale and at time stock should have been delivered.—Jakway v. Lehigh Valley R. Co., 98 Pa.Super. 300.

(4) Measure of damages to shipment of goods is difference between market value on day received and on day when shipment should have been received.—Swift & Co v. Texas & P. Ry. Co., 6 La.App. 7

Advance in price

(1) Where the goods are both damaged and delayed in transit, and during the delay the market price has risen so that the increased value through the rise in price is greater than the diminution through the injury, the shipper may recover damages resulting from the injury; the carrier cannot be exempt from the consequences of his own wrong by an advance in price.—Conover v. Wabash Ry. Co., 208 Ill.App. 105

(2) That market price of cotton when delivered to consignee is higher than it was when delivery should have been made does not affect carrier's liability for damage to the cotton by the wetting thereof while in its possession.—Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. W. M. Smith & Co., 265 S.W. 64, 165 Ark. 546 a circumstance in determining the market value of the property in its damaged condition.

Where goods were rejected by the consignee, and when tendered back to the shipper by the carrier were practically worthless, the shipper is entitled to recover their full value[28] So, where goods are shipped with directions to return in a specified time if not delivered, and the carrier fails to deliver or return the goods within a reasonable time, and because of the carrier's negligence they become practically worthless, the carrier is liable to the shipper for the depreciation in value.[29]

Whether freight charges which have been paid can be recovered as a part of the damages is discussed infra § 272. The effect of stipulations in the contract of shipment fixing the value of the property or the mode of computation thereof is discussed supra § 113.

b. Extent and Limits of Rule in General

(1) In case of loss
(2) In case of injury

(1) In Case of Loss

The rule as to the measure of damages for loss of property shipped applies both in actions of tort and in actions based on breach of contract; and its operation is not affected by the fact that the shipper was permitted to substitute other animals in place of those lost, or that the live stock was to be kept for use and was not intended for sale.

The rule stated above in respect of the amount recoverable in case of loss applies both in actions of tort and in actions based on a breach of the contract of shipment;[30] and the operation of the rule is not affected by the fact that the shipper was permitted to substitute animals other than those shipped in the place of those which were lost at a junction point on the route,[31] or that the stock shipped was to be kept for use and was not to be sold.[32]

(2) In Case of Injury

The rule as to the measure of damages for injury to property shipped applies irrespective of the character of the property or the use for which it is intended. Other circumstances connected with the shipment may or may not change or limit the rule.

The rule stated above as to the amount recoverable in case of injury applies irrespective of the character of the property,[33] or the purposes for which it was intended,[34] as for instance by the fact that the property was not intended to be placed on the market as soon as it reached its destination, but was shipped there for the purpose of getting it in condition for sale at that place,[35] or by the fact that the property shipped was intended to be kept for use and not for sale,[36] nor is the operation of the rule affected by the fact that the shipment was quarantined and sold at some place other than that of its destination because of the carrier's negligence,[37] that the property was taken for transportation to a point beyond defendant's line,[38] that each of several carriers over whose lines the property passed limited its liability to its own line,[39] that none of the carriers transported the property to the place of final destination,[40] that the carrier charged a reduced rate in consideration of an exemption from its liability as insurer, injury to the property

Diversion of shipment

Damages to mules shipped to market resulting from injury and delay by the initial carrier should not be estimated from their market value at the point for transfer to a connecting carrier, where because of their damaged condition the shippers diverted them to parties at another destination, but from their market value at the destination to which they were originally billed, and when they would have reached that place by ordinary diligence.—Lancaster v. Rogers & Adams, Tex Civ.App, 235 S W. 643, affirmed, Com.App., 248 S. W 660.

having been sustained by the carrier's negligence,[41] or that the shipper repaired the injury without cost to the consignee, where such repairs were not made for the benefit of the carrier.[42] Where plaintiff made no objection to the fixing of the cost of repairs as the measure of damages to an article damaged in transit he will be deemed to have acquiesced in the assumption that the repairs restored the article to its former value.[43]

The general rule is not changed in the case of injury to cattle by the fact that, after their arrival at destination, they were fattened and treated by a veterinarian, so that their value was enhanced,[44] or that they were shipped for immediate slaughter, and not for the purpose of resale;[45] and the fact that live stock injured by dipping in crude oil recovered from such injury does not preclude the owner from recovery for any depreciation in value caused thereby.[46] Where the shipper elects to accept delivery of the goods shipped at some point short of the destination named in the contract of shipment, and the goods are injured in transportation, he may recover the difference in the value of the goods as delivered and what they would have been worth at the place of delivery if they had not been injured in transportation.[47] While, ordinarily, the measure of damages where live stock is injured is the difference between their value before and after their injury, yet, where the shipper refused to accept the injured live stock and the carrier sold it and retained the proceeds, the measure of damages is the difference between the market value of the stock before and after injury plus the proceeds of the sale, less necessary expenses.[48] Where live stock is injured and unloaded at an intermediate point, and kept there for several weeks to recondition, and is then reshipped to the point of destination, the measure of damages for the injury is the difference between the value of the stock when it should have been delivered and when actually delivered,[49] plus the cost of reconditioning and the expense of reshipment, infra § 266, less any unpaid freight charges, infra § 272. Where it is impossible to identify and value separately such of a shipment of cattle as died in transit, their value may be fixed at a general average price, considering as a basis the cattle that arrived at destination.[50] It has been held that where goods are sold in their damaged condition the measure of damages is the difference between the contract price and the market price, and not the difference between the sale price and market price had the goods been delivered in good condition.[51] It has also been held that a shipper can recover, for injury to goods in transit, the same amount received by him on a sale of the undamaged part of the shipment, less the sum for which the damaged part was sold, as stated infra § 271; but goods which were damaged when delivered to the carrier should not be included in the amount of recovery.[52] A carrier is not liable to a shipper for a loss, caused by market conditions, on undamaged goods which were sold with the damaged goods at a uniform price per pound.[53]

c. Where Property Has No Market Value

Where property lost in transit has no market value, the measure of damages is the actual loss to the owner. In case of injury to such property the measure of damages is the diminution of their reasonable value to the owner.

Ry. Co. v. Keystone Packing Co., 195 N.E. 403, 49 Ohio App. 136.

Measure of damages

Where exact value of damaged sugar at time of sale with undamaged sugar at uniform price per pound, cannot be ascertained, and shipper's failure to show greater loss was due to his own action in selling sugar as whole, damages will be allowed against carrier in amount of difference between contract price of sugar and amount actually realized from sale of damaged sugar, carrier not being entitled to complain because price obtained was greater than if such sugar had been sold separately.—American Trading Co. of New Orleans v. New Orleans & N. E. R. Co., 105 So. 82, 159 La. 9.

Where goods lost in transportation have no market value in the ordinary acceptation of the term, such for instance, as second-hand wearing apparel, household goods, etc., compensation for the actual loss is the fundamental principle on which the measure of damage rests.[54] The amount to be awarded as damages is ordinarily the actual value of the goods lost to the owner,[55] considering their cost, the practicability and expense of replacing them, and such other conditions as affect their value to the owner,[56] and not what the goods might bring if sold as second-hand goods,[57] or merely nominal damages,[58] since the latter basis of estimating damages, it is said, would be most unjust, as the amount awarded would then depend largely on circumstances which would have nothing to do with the intrinsic value of the articles or their actual worth to the owner.[59] The fact that the owner of the lost property had presented a claim for a certain sum did not estop him from recovering his actual loss, where there had been no payment in satisfaction of the claim.[60] However, the owner is not entitled to recover some fanciful or sentimental value which he might place on the lost goods, but should recover only such reasonable damage as from the nature of the goods or the nature of their use to him he has sustained by their loss.[61] Circumstances of inconvenience to the owner resulting from loss of the use of the property cannot be included.[62]

In case of injury. The measure of damages to used household goods injured in transit is not their decreased market value, but is the diminution of their reasonable value to the owner,[63] excluding sentimental or imaginary value;[64] and this rule applies although the goods were bequeathed to plaintiff and it was unnecessary to replace them because of his possession of other such goods.[65]

d. Where Property Has No Market Value at Destination

Where property has no market value at destination the measure of damages for its loss or injury is its intrinsic or actual value, and not its value at the nearest market, although some authorities have held that the measure of damages is fixed by the market value at the nearest market.

Where there is no market value for the property at the point of destination, the intrinsic or actual value is the basis for determining the amount of damages sustained by reason of loss of, or injury to, such property,[66] and not its market value at the

Where there is no market value for injured animals, the measure of damages is the difference between their market value had they arrived at destination without injury and their real or intrinsic value in the condition in which they did arrive.[69]

e. Where Property Is Shipped for Sale or Sold in Transit for Stipulated Price

Where property is shipped for sale at a specified price or is sold in transit, the damages recoverable are based on the contract price or on the market value at destination, according to the circumstances of the case.

Where goods are shipped in pursuance of a sale thereof at a stipulated price which is less than the market price at destination, damages for loss or injury must be estimated on the basis of the price to be received under the contract of sale,[70] but if the price contracted for is greater than the market value at destination, the estimate must be based on the market value, unless the carrier had been notified at the time of shipment of the fact that the goods had been sold for a higher figure.[71]

It has been variously held that the measure of damages for injury to goods by a carrier is the difference between the contract price and the price the shipper received from a sale of the property in its damaged condition,[72] that the measure of damages for delivery of goods in an unsalable condition, without knowledge on the part of the carrier of a special price fixed therein at such point, was the market value of the goods at the time of their arrival at destination;[73] that where goods damaged in transit were worth more at the point of destination than the price contracted for, and after the loss the consignor manufactured more to replace the loss, the carrier's liability for damages was measured by the cost of manufacturing the goods to replace the loss, rather than by either the market value or the contract price, although such liability could not in any event be less than the contract price,[74] and that where the shipper had sold the goods to the consignee at the place of shipment at a price which was the market price at that place, he was entitled to recover the difference between the contract price of the goods and their market value in their damaged condition at destination, where he was notified of their nonacceptance by the consignee.[75]

Where goods shipped under a contract of sale are damaged in transit while the title is still in the shipper, the latter could sue the carrier and recover as damages the contract price, less the value of the damaged goods; and where the purchaser pays the draft attached to the bill of lading and sues the carrier for damages to the shipment, he can recover only what the shipper could have recovered.[76]

Where animals were sold at a way point before reshipment, the shipper is entitled to recover the difference between the sale price and the market value of the entire shipment at destination in good condition, in the absence of a showing that so many were uninjured as to necessitate separation of the Option to purchase

Where an owner of goods ships them consigned to another, giving the consignee an option to take and pay for them at a price fixed or to return them, in an action against the carrier for their loss, the measure of damages is not the market value at the place of destination, but at most the price fixed with interest from a day when the goods, in the usual course of carriage, would have reached the consignee and have been accepted—Mangin v Dinsmore, 62 N. Sale in transit

In action against railroad for damage to car of tomatoes which shipper had sold as in good condition at certain price prior to their arrival, and which because of damage shipper was compelled to sell at lower price, measure of damages was difference between what shipper would have received and what he did receive, and not difference between market price had tomatoes arrived in good condition and their market value as damaged.—Southern Pac R Co of Mexico v. shipment and the forwarding of the uninjured animals.[77]

Under the Cummins amendment to the Interstate Commerce Act, providing for the recovery of the "full actual loss," it has been held that a shipper's measure of damages for the loss of property which was sold by him in transit, and reconsigned to the purchaser, is the market value of the property at the point of origin or at destination, less unpaid freight, but not exceeding the price for which the property had been sold.[78]

§ 265. Interest and Costs

a. Interest
b. Attorney's fees

a. Interest

Interest is ordinarily recoverable as part of the damages for loss of, or injury to, property by a carrier, although in some cases the allowance has been held to be within the discretion of the court or jury.

Although there is some authority to the contrary, a plaintiff who recovers for the loss of, or injury to, property shipped ordinarily is entitled, as a part of his damage, to interest,[79] to be computed, in an action for loss of property, from the date of the loss, that is, from the time when the property should have been delivered,[80] or, in an action for injury to the property, from the date of the injury.[81]

Other cases have held that interest is allowable from the date the suit for the injuries was instituted,[82] from the date of shipment,[83] from the date of demand;[84] or from the time the goods arrived at destination to the time of trial, and not merely from the time the written notice required by the bill of lading was filed.[85]

The allowance of interest, according to some authorities is within the discretion of the court[86] or of the jury.[87]

Interest on cost of repairs

In an action against a carrier for damages to an asphalt plant in transit, it was within the discretion of the chancellor to allow interest on cost of repairs paid by complainant recovery of which was sought from carrier.—West Const. Co. v. Seaboard Air Line Ry. Co., 210 S.W. 633, 141 Tenn. 342.

In some cases it has been held that no interest is allowable except where the loss or injury was due to the carrier's misconduct or fraud.[88]

The right to interest as an element of damages may be waived.[89]

b. Attorney's Fees

The right to an allowance of attorney's fees in an action for loss of, or injury to, property shipped is governed by statute.

The allowance of attorney's fees as costs in an action against a carrier for loss of, or injury to, property transported depends upon the statutes, and statutes authorizing such allowance have been held valid.[90] The Interstate Commerce Act relating to the allowance to a shipper of an attorney's fee applies only to suits based on orders of the interstate commerce commission and does not authorize the allowance of such fees in an action for loss or damage to property in shipment.[91]

§ 266. Incidental Damages

A carrier is liable for incidental damages naturally and proximately arising from the loss of, or injury to, property in its possession for transportation, including expenses reasonably and necessarily incurred by the plaintiff.

In addition to the damages heretofore considered, the carrier is also liable for any other and incidental damages which naturally and proximately result from the loss or the injury complained of,[92] including any expense reasonably and necessarily incurred by plaintiff,[93] such as the expense of reconditioning or putting in salable condition damaged

(1) Rev St 66—259, 66—305, making railroad company liable for reasonable attorney's fee when sued for shortage of grain shipped, after failure to pay or deliver on demand is valid exercise of police power —Baalmann v. Union Pac. R. Co., 235 P. 1062, 118 Kan. 540.

(2) That person suing railroad company for shortage of grain shipped recovered smaller sum than stated in demand does not defeat allowance of attorney's fee under the statute, where company resisted payment of entire loss and did not tender any amount nor base its refusal to comply with demand on ground that it was excessive.—Baalmann v. Union Pac R. Co., supra.

(3) In action by shipper against railroad company for damages to shipment, attorney's fee of seventy dollars held not unreasonable.—Case v. Union Pac. R. Co, 241 P. 693, 119 Kan. 706.

In Nebraska
(1) The allowance of attorney's fees in actions against carriers is in the nature of reimbursement of costs, and the law authorizing it is not unconstitutional as providing a penalty —Eckman Chemical Co. v. (2) An allowance of attorney's fees, under a state statute providing that if a claim against a carrier is not adjusted within a certain time claimant shall, if successful, be allowed a reasonable attorney's fee, is proper, even though the shipment is an interstate one —Marsh & Marsh v. In Texas

Corpus Juris is cited in Morrow v Wabash Ry. Co, 265 S W 851, 854, 219 Mo App 62, in support of the general rule as to recovery of expenses incurred by the shipper.

Particular expenses recoverable
(1) Shippers' expenses in reshipping damaged grain to nearest point at which it could be cleaned and prepared for market, including freight charges and traveling expenses of caretaker, if reasonable in amount and necessary, are recoverable, not as special, but as consequential, damages —Panhandle & S F R Co v. Shell, Tex Civ App, 265 S W. 758.

(2) In an action against a carrier for the loss of a horse, the animal having died shortly after reaching destination, money expended by the owner to city scavengers for removing the carcass of the horse is recoverable.—Ft. Worth, etc, R Co. v. Jordan, Tex.Civ.App, 155 S W. 676.

(3) In determining the difference between what the shipper of cotton could have sold it for at the place of delivery, if delivered there in good condition, and what he could sell it for in its damaged condition, additional charges necessitated in reshipping the damaged cotton to a

goods or live stock.[94] So the owner's loss of the use of machinery during the time necessary to repair it has been held an element of damages.[95] It is not necessary to show that an item of expense due to the injury had actually been paid, it being sufficient to show that legal liability therefor had been incurred.[96]

However, expenses which are unreasonably or unnecessarily incurred,[97] or which are not definitely determinable,[98] are not recoverable; and where separate shipments became intermingled in transit the carrier is liable only for the reasonable cost of assorting the goods at final destination, regardless of the amount actually paid.[99] A carrier is not liable for expense incurred in discovering whether there has been injury.[1] It has been held that expense incurred in caring for injured live stock while recuperating could not be recovered in addition to the loss from shrinkage, since this would constitute double damages,[2] that, for the same reason, a shipper suing for injury to live stock cannot recover money paid for feed while the animals were recovering from the injury and also the difference in their market value had they arrived in good condition and their market value in their injured condition;[3] that a shipper recovering the value of dead cattle at the place of delivery was not entitled to recover the amount of freight paid on the dead cattle, since the freight charges entered into and became a part of the market value sued for and found by the jury;[4] that where the shipper recovered the value of live stock killed by the carrier's negligence he was not entitled to recover the amount expended in burning or otherwise disposing of the dead animals.[5]

So it has been held that, in an action for damages to animals in transit, the cost of feed and care after the injury had no proper place in applying the true measure of damages,[6] and that a shipper who has not paid charges for feeding is not entitled to place where it could be marketed and for rehandling it were proper elements of damage.—Gibson v. Inman Packet Co., 164 S.W. 280, 111 Ark. 521, Ann.Cas.1916A. 1043.

(4) While contract of shipment of stock obligated plaintiff to pay feed bill at unloading station, such a provision would not prevent plaintiff from recovering the amount of feed bill paid by him, which became due as the result of carrier's negligence, and which arose by reason thereof, on the theory that the carrier could not contract against the result of its own negligence.—Johnson v. Wabash Ry. Co., Mo.App., 251 S.W. 719.

(5) Plaintiff may recover from the carrier any reasonable expense incurred in searching for, and regaining possession of, the goods, including a reward offered for their return. —Greenfield Bank v. Leavitt, 17 Pick., Mass., 1, 28 Am.D. 268.

Cost of reconditioning and shipping livestock

(1) Expenses of reconditioning mules occasioned by delay in putting them on market because of emaciated condition due to carrier's negligence was legitimate item of damage.—Collins v. Texas & P. Ry. Co., 123 So. 504, 11 La.App. 445.

(2) Where injured live stock was unloaded at an intermediate point and kept there several weeks for reconditioning, and then reshipped to the point of destination, the owner is entitled to recover, in addition to the difference in the value of the stock when it should have been delivered and when actually delivered, the cost of, reconditioning and the expenses of reshipment.—Morrow v. Wabash Ry. Co., 265 S.W. 851, 219 Mo.App. 62.

(3) Where animal has been killed or rendered worthless by injury in transit, a recovery may sometimes be had in excess of its value by reason of expenses of an unsuccessful, but reasonable, effort to restore it to usefulness, but this is true only of expenditures made in a just expectation of reducing carrier's liability by amount expended.—Kennedy v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 181 P. 117, 104 Kan. 708, 5 A.L.R. 149, granting motion 179 P. 314, 104 Kan. 129, 368.

add such charges to the value of the stock lost.[7] A shipper of live stock whose duty it is to see that a health certificate is procured and furnished to the carrier so that it may be attached to the waybill, is not entitled to damages resulting from the absence of the certificate.[8]

Where an interstate shipment of perishable goods was refused by the consignee because in bad condition, the shipper cannot, in a suit against the carrier, recover expenses incurred in sending a representative to inspect the goods at the point of destination.[9]

§ 267. Special Damages

Special damages are not recoverable in an action against a carrier for loss of, or injury to, property shipped, unless it had notice or knowledge of the peculiar circumstances from which such damages would flow; but, where the carrier had notice or knowledge of the circumstances, special damages may be recovered.

In an action for loss of, or injury to, goods shipped, only such damages are recoverable as were contemplated, or might reasonably have been contemplated, by the parties.[10] To authorize a recovery of such damages as would not ordinarily flow from the loss or injury, it is essential that at the time of shipment the peculiar circumstances from which special damages would arise because of such loss or injury should be made known to the carrier,[11] and this rule applies when it is sought to recover for loss of profits arising from the loss of the goods in transit.[12]

On the other hand, if the peculiar circumstances from which special damages would arise are made known to the carrier at the time that the property is delivered and accepted for transportation,[13] or if the carrier already knew, or in the exercise of ordinary care should have known, of the circumstances,[14] special damages are recoverable; and the American Ry. Express Co., 248 S.W. 508, 198 Ky. 202.

Damages held not "special" within rule

(1) In an action by a shipper against a carrier for damages of hay while in transit, because of a leaky roof of the car in which the hay was shipped, expenses incurred in separating the good hay from that which had become worthless were not special damages within the rule requiring notice to the carrier in order to fix liability therefor.—Davis v. Clement Grain Co., Tex.Civ.App., 251 S.W. 545.

(2) Demurrage charges, which the shipper was compelled to pay while attempting to dispose of the damaged hay, were not special damages.—Davis v. Clement Grain Co., supra.

(3) In an action against a railroad for damages to dressed poultry shipped under a contract providing for computation of damages on the bona fide invoice price to consignee at the time and place of shipment, plaintiff was properly allowed damages computed on such basis, although he did not notify defendant that they would accrue, and did not plead them as required in order to recover special damages.—St. Louis Southwestern Ry. When carrier charged with notice

In view of the tick eradication law, requiring both the shipper and carrier of livestock, under a threat of penal prosecution, to dip all stock transported in an arsenical solution, notice by the shipper to the carrier that cattle delayed in transit had been dipped in such solution immediately before shipment and would likely be injured if not properly sheltered and cared for is unnecessary to render the carrier liable for injuries resulting from failure to shelter, feed, and water them properly, for the law requires the carrier to have notice of the dipping, while, as a carrier, it is charged with notice of the effect thereof, it being a matter of common knowledge that injury will result from exposure of cattle to heat immediately after such dipping.—St. Louis Southwestern Ry. Co. of Texas v. Culberson, Tex.Civ.App., 248 S.W. 111.

rule has been applied with respect to the allowance of such damages as arise from loss of a sale under a contract of which the carrier had knowledge,[15] damages for loss of the profits which would have been directly derived from the use of the property under circumstances with which the carrier was acquainted,[16] and for expenses incurred in renotifying and delivering to purchasers goods purchased to take the place of those lost or destroyed.[17]

§ 268. Remote or Speculative Damages

Remote or speculative damages are not recoverable in an action against a carrier for loss of, or injury to, property transported.

In an action against a carrier for loss of, or injury to, property transported, no recovery for remote or speculative damages is permissible.[18] Thus, where injuries to a mare in foal caused injury to, and the subsequent death of, the colt which was prematurely born, there can be no recovery based on what the colt would have been worth had it been born uninjured, such damages being speculative.[19]

§ 269. Exemplary Damages

Exemplary damages may be recovered against a carrier for gross negligence or willful breach of duty.

Exemplary or punitive damages may be allowed for gross negligence or willful breach of duty on the part of the carrier,[20] whether the action is based on breach of a contract or statutory duty,[21] but not otherwise.[22]

§ 270. Duty of Owner to Prevent or Reduce Damages

It is the duty of the property owner to make reasonable efforts to minimize the damages, and no recovery can be had for damage which such efforts would have prevented.

It is the duty of the owner of the property injured by the carrier during transportation to use all reasonable means to render the effect of the injury as light as possible, and no recovery can be had for damage which such care would have prevented;[23] but failure to prevent additional damage does not preclude recovery for that part of the damage not due to such failure, but to the carrier's negligence.[24] The general rule, however, does not impose upon the consignee the duty to unload the injured property on Sunday, for the purpose of reducing damages;[25] and where the goods have been stolen in transit and part of them are recovered and held by the police, the carrier is not thereby relieved of his obligation to deliver the goods so held, and no obligation rests on the owner to recover such goods from the police department for the purpose of reducing damages.[26] Where a carrier fails to deliver goods or return them to the shipper within a reasonable time, whereby they become practically val-useless, and the market therefor has closed for the season, the carrier, electing to keep the goods until the market reopens, cannot thereafter force the shipper to accept and dispose of the goods for the purpose of diminishing his damages.[27] So, where cattle were injured in transit, the owner was not required to place them, immediately on their arrival at destination, on an unfavorable market for sale, but was entitled to a reasonable time in which to prepare them for sale.[28]

§ 271. Matters in Mitigation

In awarding damages for loss of, or injury to, property, the carrier is entitled to any legitimate allowance in reduction of the amount awarded, such as the sum received by plaintiff on sale of the injured property, etc.

A carrier may show any facts connected with the loss or injury of property shipped which legitimately go to reduce the amount of damages.[29] Thus, in awarding damages for goods injured in transportation, the carrier should be credited with the amount realized from the sale of the goods,[30] and, where damages are claimed for loss of cattle killed in transit, a deduction should be allowed for the amount received for the carcasses.[31] Likewise, where the shipper removed, and sold the hides of cattle killed in transit, the carrier should be allowed the market value of the hides at the time when and the place where they were removed, not the actual price.[32] If by an actual sale and receipt of the price, the consignee protects himself against any loss resulting from the goods being damaged in transit, he cannot recover of the carrier anything beyond nominal damages and costs.[33]

In an action to recover for the loss of a draft, the carrier is at liberty to reduce the damages, which are prima facie the amount due on the draft, by proof of payment, insolvency, or any fact tending to invalidate the security;[34] but a carrier is not entitled to factor's commissions as an abatement of damages, where cotton consigned to the factor is lost by the carrier in transit,[35] although it has been held that where calculating machines sent to a prospective purchaser on trial was returned to the agent but lost by the carrier in transit, in an action by the agent as consignee the carrier was entitled, in determining the damages, to have commissions which plaintiff would have earned if he had sold the machines deducted from the selling price.[36]

The right of the carrier to a deduction or credit in fixing the amount of damages does not, of course, entitle it to credit for expenditures not actually incurred.[37]

§ 272. Deduction of Freight

Unpaid freight charges should be deducted from the damages awarded, and if prepaid cannot be recovered, in

Deduction authorized

Where, after loss of a part of the goods shipped, the carrier sells the residue, without knowledge of the loss, and the consignee brings an action against the carrier for money had and received, constituting the proceeds of the sale, the carrier may deduct from the amount of recovery a discount which it allowed the purchaser of the goods on ascertaining the deficiency.—Stevens v. Action by owner of special interest

Where consignor retained title to machinery, but consignee had special property therein, in latter's action against carrier for injuries, interest of consignor was chargeable with amount realized on debt in its public sale of machinery after its return by consignee, and from any amount which jury might find to be market value of interests of both, there should be deducted amount received by consignor.—Allen v. Cases distinguished

"The appellee relies upon the case of Kyle v. Laurens R. Co., 10 Rich., S.C., 382, 70 Am.D. 231, [cited in the preceding note] in opposition to this contention. This was a case concerning a consignment of cotton to a factor for sale and lost in transit, and the court there held that the measure of damages was the market value of the cotton at the place of destination, without deducting the factor's commissions. We think the present case is clearly distinguishable from that case. The goods in that case consisted of staple goods for which there was a ready and prompt market, and upon the receipt of them the factor could have readily earned the commission which had been agreed upon between him and the owner, while in the present case there was no ready market such as there is for staple articles like cotton, grain, and the like, and in fact they were not consigned to him for sale at all, but were merely returned to him as not satisfactory under the agreement of sale with the consignor."—Adams Express Co. v. White, 104 A. 110, 111, 132 Md. 626

37. Va.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Cohen Weenen & Co., 157 S.E. 563, 156 Va. 313.

Contention held untenable

Where tobacco, damaged by rain, was not uncoopered and redried, the contention that, had the carrier uncoopered the tobacco and found it not damaged, such carrier might have been liable for so handling the shipment, and that, therefore, it should be given credit for such expenditures as redrying would have necessitated, was held untenable.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Cohen Weenen & Co., 157 S.E. 563, 156 Va. 313.

the absence of a stipulation in the contract authorizing recovery thereof.

Since the value at destination is the basis for estimating the damages recoverable against a carrier for loss of, or injury to, property transported, as stated supra § 264, unpaid freight charges must be deducted from the amount awarded,[38] that is, the owner of the property is entitled to its net value at the place of destination;[39] and such charges, if paid in advance, cannot be recovered by him.[40] On the other hand, it has been held that where by the terms of the contract the damages are to be computed on the basis of the value of the property, being the bona fide invoice price, if any, to the consignee, including the freight charges, if prepaid, at the place and time of shipment, plaintiff is entitled to recover freight paid by him as a part of the damages.[41]

Where the freight due the carrier enters into the amount of damages for which the carrier is liable for loss of goods shipped, limitations do not run against the carrier's right to have the freight deducted from such damages,[42] and no deduction on account of unpaid freight need be made where defendant makes no claim therefor.[43]

§ 273. Abandonment on Account of Damage

Where property is injured or part of it lost in transit, the consignee must accept the shipment and sue for damages; but where the property is so injured as to be worthless the consignee may refuse to accept it and sue for its full value.

Where the goods are injured during transportation, or part of them are lost, it is generally held that the consignee cannot abandon the consignment and sue for the full value, but must accept the goods as tendered, or the portion tendered, as stated supra § 178, and sue for damages.[44] It is impossible, it is said, to distinguish in principle between damage due to delay and damage due to impairment of value by a physical injury to the goods;[45] and as shown supra §§ 178 and 222, the person entitled to

In New York

(1) The rule stated in the text has been followed in some cases.—Brand v. Weir, 57 N.Y.S. 731, 27 Misc. 212—Mills v. National S. S. Co., 5 N.Y.S. 258.

(2) But the contrary has also been held.—Freeman v. Weir, 94 N.Y.S. 327, 47 Misc. 681.

(3) So it has been held that the consignee has an election to reject the property, dispose of it to the best advantage, and hold the carrier liable for the difference between the sum realized from the sale and what it would have been worth had it been delivered in good order.—Monell v. Northern Cent. R. Co., 16 Hun 585.

goods shipped cannot, on account of delay, refuse to receive them and sue for the full value.

However, the unlawful refusal of the consignee to accept damaged goods, and his action in bringing suit for their value, is of no consequence where it does not appear that any different result would have been reached had the consignees received the goods in their injured condition and then sued for damages.[46]

Limitation of rule. Where the goods are so materially damaged as to destroy their value, the consignee may, of course, refuse to accept as shown supra § 178 a and sue for the full value,[47] since in that event nothing that the consignee might do would lessen the loss and so diminish the carrier's liability.[48]

§ 274. Injury to Corpse

Damages are recoverable for the negligent handling of a corpse resulting in injury thereto, and, if the act of the carrier was willful, exemplary damages will be awarded. Damages for mental suffering of a surviving relative are recoverable, although there is also contrary authority.

Damages are recoverable from a carrier for negligent handling of a corpse resulting in injury thereto,[49] and, if the act was a wanton and willful breach of duty on the part of the carrier, exemplary damages will be allowed.[50] Damages for mental suffering may be recovered by a parent for negligent injury to the body of a child transported by a carrier,[51] by a son for injury to the body of his mother,[52] by a husband for injury to the body of his wife,[53] or by a sister for injury to the body of her brother;[54] and the fact that a mother, suing for the mutilation of her daughter's corpse, was not told before interment of the body that it has been mutilated, would not bar recovery of such damages.[55] On the other hand, it has been held that, in the absence of statute, the negligent injury of a dead body by a carrier gives to the mother, who had not contracted for the transportation of the body, no right to recover for mental suffering.[56]

(1) In determining shipper's right to reparation from railroad because of excessive freight rates, duties of public utilities commission are quasi-judicial.—Sparta Foundry Co v. Michigan Public Utilities Commission, 267 N.W. 736, 275 Mich. 562.

(2) When claim for refund of illegal transportation charges is based on application of wrong rate, corporation commission's jurisdiction and power to determine whether different rate from that charged was legal rate is judicial and not legislative.—St. Louis & S F. Ry. Co. v. State, 244 P. 440, 116 Okl. 95, certiorari granted 46 S Ct. 630, 271 U. S. 656, 70 L Ed. 1135, and certiorari dismissed 47 S.Ct. 448, 273 U.S. 749, 779, 71 L.Ed 888.

c. Rate as Controlling Charges

The prescribed rate controls the amount to be charged.

The rates established by the appropriate authorities have the force and effect of statutes[64] so far as consistent with the law, but not where repugnant thereto.[65] The authority for any charge, condition, practice, or service must be found in the tariff, and nothing not so found can be inferred or added thereto.[66] Thus, when a tariff has become legally promulgated, it is binding on both the carrier and any shipper taking advantage of it, and its terms become in such respects, the only contract between the two allowed by law.[67] On interstate shipments the carrier must collect and the shipper is required to pay the rates named in the applicable tariffs filed with the interstate commerce commission.[68] As to intra-state shipments where a state board or commission fixes the rates, its tariffs and classifications and not those of the carriers are the only lawful ones; the carriers and all other parties are bound by them as long as they remain in force, and no deviation from the charges fixed can be made which have any binding effect without the approval of the board or commission.[69] A carrier can lawfully charge neither more nor less than the rate fixed by the tariff sheets on file,[70] and the carrier cannot justify the imposition of rates in excess of those prescribed by statute by showing that the amount charged was no more than a reasonable compensation for the services rendered.[71] Rules in the tariff as to conditions prerequisite must be complied with in order to validate the charges.[72]

Notice of rate. Tariff rates for transportation by common carriers are matters of law, of which all concerned are charged with notice.[73]

The form of rate schedule on interstate shipments is for the determination of the interstate commerce commission, and it can approve the splitting up of the charge made by a carrier for transportation and other service, as by making a line-

Contract, estoppel, or waiver ineffective to alter rate

An interstate carrier cannot, by contract or otherwise, by estoppel or waiver, directly or indirectly, increase or decrease the duly established freight rates, and the shipper must make good any deficiency not collected, regardless of the cause, freight rates established by the approval of the interstate commerce commission dominating every shipment and contract, and this rule applies to a through rate made up of the sum of local rates of connecting carrier.—Lancaster v. haul rate and a rental charge for refrigerator cars where they are required.[74]

d. Duration of Rate

An established rate is the rate in force until it is changed in a proper and lawful manner.

Where a freight rate has once been fixed, it is an established rate until it is changed in some manner allowed by law,[75] and the carrier cannot evade this rule by placing the articles for which the rate was established in another class.[76] Once lawfully established, a rate continues to be the legal rate until legally canceled, and subsequent tariffs naming new rates without canceling previous rates cannot carry the new rate into lawful effect.[77] Thus, where the statute fixes the maximum rate on intra-state freight as being the rate in force on a specified date, and a subsequent amendment authorizes the commission to change it, the maximum rate as fixed by the first act prevails until it is changed by the commission.[78]

e. Milling in Transit and Similar Privileges

Stoppage in transit privileges must be exercised under the tariff of the carrier or not at all, and must be accepted in their entirety.

Stoppage in transit for milling and similar privileges must be exercised under the tariff of the carrier and not otherwise,[79] and the inbound and outbound movements must be in fact parts of a single transaction.[80] Rates affording such rights are an entirety and must be accepted and carried out in their entirety or not at all.[81]

§ 276. Terminology

The courts have defined and explained various terms used in connection with the establishment and determination of the reasonableness of rates, as, for example, "rates," "class rate," "commodity rate," "joint rate," "proportional rate," "rates in force," "rate tariff," "transportation," "team track delivery," and "intermediate."

The word "rate" means a proportional estimation according to some standard.[82] The net amount which a carrier receives from a shipper and retains fixes the "rate" charged.[83] A prescribed rate may consist of a variety of elements, such as the character of the commodity to be transported, the distance of carriage, the privileges and facilities accorded, and the rules and regulations accompanying the tariff, or that may be imposed by the commission, and the like.[84]

Class rate. Where a single rate applies to a number of articles of the same general character, it is a class rate.[85] A rate for a particular commodity to consist of a certain percentage of a class rate is a class rate and not a commodity rate.[86]

Commodity rate. Where a rate applies to a specific commodity alone, it is a commodity rate.[87]

Joint rate. A joint rate is a rate prescribed to be charged for the transportation of goods over the connecting lines of two or more railroads, and to be divided among them for the service rendered by each respectively.[88]

Proportional rate. A proportional rate is a part of a through rate;[89] a share of the aggregate charge from the origin to destination which one or more carriers accepts for performing a definite portion of the whole transportation service.[90]

Rates in force are those which a carrier establishes as its present charges for transportation, as distinguished from those which are absolute, tentative, or perhaps only to take effect in the future that is, rates in effect, those open to public inspection and on which shipments may be made, if offered.[91]

Rate tariff. A rate tariff is in essence a statement by the carrier to possible shippers that it will furnish certain services under certain conditions for a certain price.[92]

Transportation. "Transportation" within the meaning of a schedule of charges for transportation as used in the Interstate Commerce Act includes cars and other vehicles and all instrumentalities and facilities of shipment or carriage, irrespective of ownership or of any contract, express or implied, for the use thereof, and all services in connection with the receipt, delivery, elevation, and transfer in transit, ventilation, refrigeration, or icing, storage, and handling of property transported.[93]

Distinction between transportation and switching service. Ordinarily, in rate making a transfer service is distinguished from transportation, and switching service is usually defined as one which precedes or follows transportation on which legal freight charges have already been earned or are to be earned.[94] However, the fact that the entire service rendered by a carrier is confined to its own sidetracks or switch tracks will not prevent it from being transportation,[95] and whether a particular service is switching or transportation service is not determined alone by whether the service is one which precedes or follows transportation service, but is also tested by whether the movement of the cars is under the direction of the yardmaster who has charge of the switching service or the trainmaster having charge of transportation service.[96]

Team track delivery. Team track delivery is a service for which no separate tariff charge is pro-

Continuous mileage rate as joint rate

Where the railroad commissioners declared that a "continuous mileage rate" should apply to two connecting railroad companies, the stock and bonds of one of which were owned by the other although each had its separate directors, and was operated separately, applying the rate previously fixed for the owning company, such rate was a joint rate within the meaning of a statute declaring that the railroad commissioners shall have power to make just and reasonable joint rates for all connecting railroads, and the action of the commissioners was not ipso facto illegal on the ground that it was not a joint rate and was not authorized by statute, if the rate so fixed was reasonable and just.—Hill v Wadley Southern R. vided, and which is analogous to freight depot service for less than carload freight.[97]

§ 277. Right of Carrier to Fix Rates

a. In general
b. Increase of rates by carrier

a. In General

Except as restricted by constitutional or statutory provisions, carriers are entitled to fix the rates for transportation.

Unless otherwise provided by statute, the carrier has the primary right to fix rates for transportation.[99] Where the carrier has the power and duty of initiating rates, it has the primary duty of fixing freight and other charges.[1] So, a carrier with knowledge of the possibility of large shipments from a certain point over its lines cannot excuse the failure to establish rates from such point by attempting to impose the duty on the shippers of requesting the establishment of a route and rate.[2]

As to interstate commerce, under the Interstate Commerce Act, except for the requirement provided in 49 U. S. C. A. § 4, that a carrier cannot charge more for a short haul than for a long haul where the shorter is included in the longer unless authorized by the interstate commerce commission,[3] the carrier retains the right to fix the rates;[4] and subject to the requirements that the rates be reasonable, considered in § 282 infra, that there be no discrimination, as shown in §§ 348-352 infra, and that the rates fixed do not menace steady and efficient service by the carriers, a carrier is entitled to initiate rates and to adopt such policy of rate-making as to it seems wise,[5] and may file two rates, one of which is the regular rate in which the common-law liability is preserved, and the other a lesser rate based on an agreed valuation of the commodity shipped and limiting the liability to that valuation; but such rates must be open to all the public.[6] If, after a hearing, rates are shown to be unreasonable, the commission may set them aside and require the substitution of just and reasonable for unjust and unreasonable charges;[7] except, however, that railroads have the power to fix rates as low as they choose and to reduce rates when they choose.[8] The jurisdiction of the interstate commerce commission to alter a rate fixed by the carrier depends on a finding, based on evidence, that such rate is unreasonable,[9] and the mere disruption of the existing rate structure is insufficient to justify the cancellation of a carrier's proposed rates.[10]

In so far as intra-state commerce is concerned, the right of a carrier to fix its rates therefor varies in the different states. In some states the rate-making power over intra-state commerce has been taken away from the carriers and, as appears infra § 278, conferred upon state commissions, and the carrier is precluded from initiating rates and may only charge for transportation of persons and property over its lines according to the rates which have been approved and prescribed by such a commission.[11] In other states, rules and regulations modeled in varying degrees on the method employed by the federal government for the regulation of interstate commerce rates have been adopted. In some of these states the carrier retains the right to fix the rates for intra-state transportation of property or passengers over its lines, which rates, as appears infra § 278 d, are subject to control and revision by a state commission,[12] and rates filed and published by the carrier with the commission do not need approval by the commission before they become legal rates, but they may be suspended by the commission and their reasonableness ascertained.[13] In still other states, after the state regulatory commission has established a maximum schedule of rates, the carriers file their tariffs, which cannot exceed the maximum rates established, but which they may make as much less as they choose.[14] Under some statutes, the carriers publish and file with the state commission a schedule of rates which as to first instance rates become effective without further action; thereafter, a carrier may make a general horizontal reduction of rates without obtaining the consent of the commission by merely publishing and filing them with the commission, but any increase in rates by the carrier becomes effective only after a hearing on notice by the commission, a finding that the proposed increase is fair and reasonable, and an order or other action by the commission sanctioning the increase.[15] A statute granting railroads power to regulate tolls and compensation yields to a constitutional provision conferring upon a state commission the power to make rates.[16]

Under charter grant. In some states certain carriers have been granted the right in their charters to fix rates over their lines. Such grants of power are strictly construed against the carriers and in favor of the public,[17] and the rates must be fixed in the manner and by the agency designated.[18] However, within the limits of their grant

"First instance" tariff

A schedule of rates published and filed by a railroad, providing for its absorption of switching charges of connecting carriers at destination, where, under previously filed and published rates shipper was required to pay such charges, was a change in an existing tariff, and not a "first instance" tariff, within L.1905 c. 176, Gen.St.1913 §§ 4290–4297.—National Elevator Co. v. After a voluntary reduction of rates to all shippers on all commodities at all stations in Minnesota, the original rates cannot be reinstated without consent of railroad and warehouse commission, after a hearing on notice, a finding that reinstatement will be a fair and reasonable change, and an order or other action sanctioning change.—National Elevator Co. v. 18. Supervision by commission

(1) Railroad commission was empowered to see that rates fixed by railroad's directors pursuant to power conferred by legislative charter do not exceed those fixed in statute.—Gulf & S. I. R. Co. v. Laurel Oil & Fertilizer Co., 158 So. 778, 172 Miss. 630, amended and suggestion of error overruled 159 So. 838, 172 Miss. 630, corrected 160 So. 564, 172 Miss. 630.

they are entitled to fix their rates,[19] and a railroad corporation, under a charter authorizing it to fix rates over its lines, is not limited in its right to fix its freight charges to commodities transported from one point on its line to another thereon, but it includes commodities which are transported in part over another line, although, of course, in the fixing of joint freight tariffs with other railroads it is limited in its action to that portion of the through tariff covering the transportation of commodities over its own line.[20]

Private carrier. A private carrier not engaged in the business of carrying as a public employment may contract for the delivery of goods in a particular case for a stipulated reward, unaffected by the rates fixed for the regulation of railroads or other public agencies.[21] An order of a state commission requiring a railroad to transport a show at a special rate and providing that the company may enter into a contract for the transportation on terms similar to existing contracts with other shows, does not deprive the carrier of its right to contract as a private carrier for the transportation of traveling shows.[22] It has been held that, where an Auto, Stage, and Truck Transportation Act defines transportation companies to include private carriers, they cannot raise any charge or rate without first securing the consent of the regulatory commission.[23]

b. Increase of Rates by Carrier

A carrier is entitled to advance rates where the ones in force are so low as to be unremunerative, and no presumption of wrong arises from an advance of rates by the carrier, but an unreasonable advance will be relieved against by the courts.

There is no presumption of wrong arising from a change of rate made by a carrier.[24] A carrier has the right to change rates which, to meet an exigency, have been made so low as to be unremunerative, when the necessity therefor has ceased to exist.[25] If rates have been fixed too low in the past, it has the right to meet changed conditions by increasing them if the increase is reasonable,[26] and a state statute which denies the carrier that right and forces it to continue rates which are unremunerative and confiscatory is unconstitutional and void.[27] When rates are changed, the carrier making the change must, when properly called on, be able to give a good reason therefor;[28] and if in a proper proceeding they are shown to be arbitrary and unreasonable, the courts will relieve against them.[29] If it has been stipulated by the Action by majority of directors sufficient

Under legislative charter conferring upon railroad's directors power to fix rates, rate schedule must be approved by majority, but not by all of directors.—Gulf & S. I. R. Co. v. Delegation by directors of rate making power

(1) In legislative railroad charter conferring upon directors power to fix rates, section which validated acts of executive committee approved by quorum of directors had reference to general management and operation of railroad in its individual corporate action, and did not authorize board of directors to delegate to executive committee power to fix rates —Gulf & S. I. R. Co. v. Laurel Oil & Fertilizer Co., 159 So 838, 172 Miss 630, amending and overruling suggestion of error 158 So. 778, 172 Miss. 630, corrected 160 So. 564, 172 Miss. 630.

(2) Rates promulgated by freight agent without railroad commission's approval were ineffective and rates fixed by commission governed, entitling shipper to recover overcharges. —Gulf & S. I. R. Co. v. Laurel Oil & Fertilizer Co., 158 So. 778, 172 Miss. 630, amended and suggestion of error overruled 159 So. 838, 172 Miss 630, corrected 160 So. 564, 172 Miss. 630.

That a provision of the Interstate Commerce Act, 49 U.S.C.A. § 4 (2), which provides that, where a carrier by railroad in competition with a water route or routes reduces the rates on the carriage of freight to or from competitive points, it shall not be permitted to increase such rates unless after a hearing by the commission it shall be found that such proposed increase rests on changed conditions other than the elimination of water competition, does not apply where the reduction in rates was with the approval of the commission, given after a hearing, by an order entered on the application of the carrier for relief from the operation of the section, so that, in such case, a proposed increase may be made without a prior finding by the commission, on proper hearing, that such increase rests on changed conditions other than the elimination of water competition.[31]

§ 278. Power of State to Fix or Regulate Rates

a. In general
b. State and federal control mutually exclusive
c. Effect of charter provisions
d. State commissions

a. In General

A state has power to regulate the rates for the transportation of persons and property within its jurisdiction by carriers, regardless of prior contract obligations of the carrier.

Common carriers are engaged in public employment affecting the public interest, and, subject to the constitutional limitations against the impairment of vested rights, or depriving persons of property without due process of law, or depriving them of the equal protection of the law, a state has power to regulate the amount of charges by such carriers for the transportation of persons and property within its own jurisdiction unless restricted by some contract in the charter,[32] even where the rates are not discriminatory and preferential,[33] and even where there is a blending of interstate and intra-state operations of the carriers unless congress has exercised its paramount constitutional power to limit the authority of the state.[34] This is so even though the property of the carrier may have been mortgaged[35] or its income pledged[36] as security for the payment of obligations incurred, or even though contracts have been previously entered into between the carrier and its patrons fixing the compensation to be paid for transporta-

Where the commission found that the withdrawal of boats from coast to coast service was not on account of the rates made by the rail carriers with which the boats compete, but on account of slides in the Panama Canal and the extraordinary rise in ocean freights, and that the substantial disappearance of water competition was merely temporary, the changed conditions found were something other than the "elimination of water competition" which congress intended should not justify raising the reduced rates.—Skinner & Eddy Corporation v. Limitation based on interstate commerce requirements

tion.[37] Such power may be exercised by direct action of the legislature, even in the absence of specific authority such as is contained in the constitutions of a number of the states,[38] or by delegating the power to some appropriate agency,[39] such, for instance, as a municipal corporation,[40] or, as appears in subdivision d of this section, a state board or commission.

The power of the state to regulate freight charges includes the power to establish through rates over separate lines within its borders,[41] and where a joint tariff between two or more roads has been agreed on, such tariff is as much within the control of the legislature as if it related to transportation over a single line.[42] Where the state enacts legislation governing intra-state rates, such legislation supersedes common-law rights and liabilities of a carrier in that regard.[43]

b. State and Federal Control Mutually Exclusive

Except in so far as the federal government has control of intra-state rates so as to prevent unjust discrimination against interstate commerce, the power of the federal and state governments to control interstate and intra-state rates respectively are mutually exclusive of each other.

A state commission has no power to change and fix the relation between interstate and intra-state commerce rates,[44] and state regulation of rates should be so construed and applied as not to conflict with valid federal regulation of rates.[45] Neither a state commission nor the interstate commerce commission are subject to interference by

A contract by a railroad company to transport logs for a lumber company at an agreed rate, made in connection with a sale to the lumber company of the land from which the logs were to be cut, is subject to the action of state authorities changing the lawful rate on such shipments, and is not destroyed by such action, but its terms are modified as was presumably contemplated by the parties.—Northern Pac. the other in the establishment of intra-state and interstate rates respectively.[46] The power of the federal government to regulate transportation is limited to commerce which is not intra-state, and the authority of a state to regulate transportation within its borders, including the power to prescribe rates for transportation, is in no sense restricted by federal legislation,[47] with the exception that under the Interstate Commerce Act the interstate commerce commission has authority to remove discriminations against interstate commerce, and to that end may control intra-state rates so far as necessary to remove unjust discriminations against interstate commerce resulting from the relation of interstate and intra-state rates which are reasonable in themselves.[48]

c. Effect of Charter Provisions

A state may exempt a carrier from legislative control over its rates in granting it a charter, but such exemption must be clear and unmistakable and will not be presumed from general language.

As intimated, supra § 278 a, a state in granting a charter to a common carrier may exempt it from legislative control over rates charged for transportation because this amounts to a contract between the state and the carrier, the obligations of which cannot be impaired;[49] but the exemption must be made in the charter by clear and unmistakable language inconsistent with the exercise of such power by the legislature.[50] A general charter provision giving power to charge and collect tolls necessarily implies that the charges shall be reasonable, and does not detract from the power of the state through its legislation, or the agency lawfully constituted thereby, to prescribe reasonable rates to be observed by the carrier;[51] nor does a charter giving a railroad company the exclusive right of transportation or conveyance of persons, merchandise, and produce, providing the charge shall not exceed a certain rate guarantee that the company shall always have right to charge the maximum rates named.[52] The power to regulate rates is continuing in its nature and cannot be bargained away except by words of positive grant or something equivalent thereto, and if there is a reasonable doubt, it must be resolved in favor of the existence of the power.[53] Where the exclusive power of fixing rates is not conferred on the carrier in express terms by statute or by charter, the state may afterward pass laws regulating such rates.[54] Charters are taken subject to constitutional provisions existing at the time they are granted, which authorize the legislature to pass laws establishing reasonable maximum rates of charges,[55] and notwithstanding the right is conferred upon the carrier by its charter to regulate its rates, the state may, nevertheless, exercise visitorial powers over the carrier to see that it keeps within its charter limits.[56] Where a carrier surrenders a charter

d. State Commissions

(1) In general
(2) Powers of commissions
(3) Reparation

(1) In General

State boards or commissions have in general been established in the various states to regulate and control the carriers' rates, their authority ranging from the power to fix and establish the rates themselves to the power to supervise the rates established by the carriers and see that they are just and reasonable.

The power of a state to regulate or fix rates for intra-state traffic through a board or commission, considered in § 133 of the C.J.S. title Constitutional Law, also 12 C.J. p 852 note 89, p 853 note 93, has been exercised in the majority of the states by the establishment by the state constitution, or legislature, or both, of a state board or commission with power to regulate and fix intra-state rates.[58] The method of control differs in the various states. In some states the rates are established by a state board or commission, and are inoperative other than by force of the order of the commission or board;[59] in others a state commission establishes a maximum schedule of rates after which the carriers are required to file their tariffs which cannot

Independent governmental branch

In at least one jurisdiction the state constitution has expressly established a state railway commission independent of the executive, legislative, or judicial branch of the state government, and while under the constitution its powers may be controlled or limited by the legislature, unless there is specific legislation that might limit or affect its power, such commission has had conferred upon it all the control over the establishment of rates for common carriers that the state can exercise, and possesses such independent legislative, judicial, executive, and administrative powers as are necessarily involved in performing its duty to regulate and fix rates for common carriers.—In re Lincoln Traction Co., 171 N.W. 192, 103 Neb. 229

Subsequent to federal control

The public service commission of Pennsylvania has power to regulate intra-state freight rates for carrying coal during the two-year period subsequent to the termination of federal control, where such regulation does not interfere with, or show discrimination against, interstate commerce.—Lehigh & N. E. R. Co. v. Public Service Commission of Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, 79 Pa.Super. 540.

Contract carriers

(1) Provision in Motor Transportation Act authorizing commissioner of public utilities to regulate rates of contract carriers by motor vehicle is not invalid.—Anderson v. Thomas, 26 P.2d 60, 144 Or. 572.

(2) Statute authorizing department of public service to supervise, regulate, fix, alter, and amend just, fair, and reasonable classifications, rules, and regulations and minimum rates and charges of every contract carrier and special carrier in state is constitutional.—Prater v. Department of Public Service of Washington, 60 P.2d 238, 187 Wash. 335.

Spur track held subject to state regulatory power

Evidence that a railroad operated two industrial spur tracks, each about five miles in length, charging rates covered by tariffs on file with the public service commission, etc., was held to sustain commission's finding that such spurs were part of the railroad, although the railroad did not own the right of way on which they were constructed and used a different kind of engine in operating on the spurs, so as to subject them to regulation by the state regulatory commission.—Missouri Southern R. Co. v. Public Service Commission, 214 S.W. 379, 279 Mo. 484.

exceed the maximum rates established;[60] but which, as appears supra § 277 a, they can make as much less as they choose, and if made less than the maximum the commission cannot suspend them, unless specific power to do so is given it.[61] In others, so long as the carrier establishes reasonable rates, they cannot be lowered by commission or court, but when the carrier fails to do so the commission is authorized to prescribe just and reasonable maximum rates;[62] and in still others the legislature has not delegated to the commission the absolute power of fixing maximum rates, but the power only to ascertain and determine what rates are reasonable,[63] the rates themselves being fixed by the carriers with power to review their reasonableness vested in a state commission,[64] a method which, as appears from a consideration of the rules set forth infra § 279, is similar to that employed by the federal government in the regulation of interstate rates.

Where a commission makes a valid order for the observance of freight rates made and promulgated by it, it is the duty of the carrier to obey such order and to comply with all its requirements.[65]

(2) Powers of Commissions

A commission of the character under consideration has only those powers given it by constitutional or statutory provisions, which in general cover the fixing or regulating of all intra-state rates covering the transportation and services connected with intra-state traffic.

A state regulatory board or commission has no inherent power; all its powers are derivative and must be based on constitutional or statutory provisions.[66] Its powers are not as broad as the legislature's;[67] it has such power only as is conferred upon it either expressly or by fair implication,[68] which must be exercised in strict accordance

Elimination of discrimination

In readjusting rates, readjustment of rates apart from the general schedule of rates may be made to eliminate discrimination—Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. State, 267 P. 253, 130 Okl. 263.

Power to change existing rates only in the event that such rates are found to be unreasonable cannot be otherwise exercised.—Valley & Siletz R. Co. v. Thomas, 48 P.2d 358, 151 Or. 80.

Power to make general schedule of maximum rates

(1) For the transportation of all commodities, on all railroads, to and from all points within the state, on a general and comprehensive complaint that rates are too high, or on like information of the commission itself, is not conferred upon the Kentucky railroad commission by the Kentucky act of March 10, 1900, Acts, 1900, p. 5, c. 2, authorizing it, on complaint that the rates of any railway company are extortionate, or on its own information, to fix a reasonable rate if, after hearing, it finds the rates extortionate.—Siler v. Illi-

with the statute conferring the power.[69] However, where the power conferred upon the commission is in general terms to be exercised in the public welfare, and a wide discretion is accorded it which is not constrained by peremptory instructions, the public welfare is the test and measure of its powers.[70] The power of a commission to which has been delegated the exercise of power relating to rates of carriers is exclusive;[71] and where the constitution of the state has created a state commission and conferred upon it power over rates of carriers such commission has all the power and the legislature has none of it.[72] Its power to establish or change rates is continuous, so that a material change in the conditions from those existing at the time rates were established will be ground for new action in the premises by the commission.[73]

The power of a state railroad commission to fix rates is in subordination to constitutional or statutory provisions prohibiting discrimination between long and short hauls.[74] Under a statute authorizing the commission to permit common carriers to establish special preferential industrial rates, the commission has no authority to establish special rates or require their continuance, but only to approve special rates submitted by a carrier, who may withdraw them at will, but cannot put a new rate into effect except on the approval of the commission.[75] Power given to a commission to make reasonable and just rates authorizes it to increase as well as to decrease rates.[76] Where power is conferred upon it to make and promulgate rates, the rates must be made general in their nature and applicable alike to all persons and corporations under like circumstances, and must not in terms be made applicable to only one person or corporation

(2) "The difference between the fixing of one rate, or a few upon specific complaint or information, and the adoption of a general scheme of rates applicable in all cases to all the roads, is vast and important. In the one case it can be fairly accomplished, while in the other the chances of injustice and great inequalities are infinite and almost certain to concur. We do not say that under this statute, as we construe it, there must be a separate proceeding or complaint for each separate rate. A complaint, or a proceeding on information by the commission itself, in regard to any road, may include more than the rate on one commodity or more than one rate, but there must be some specific complaint or information in regard to each rate to be investigated, and there can be under this statute, no such wholesale complaint, which by its looseness and its generalities can be made applicable to every rate in operation on a railroad, or upon several or all of the railroads of the State. If the legislature intended to give such an universal and all-prevailing power it is not too much to say that the language used in giving it should be so plain as not to permit of doubt as to the legislative intent."—Siler v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., supra.

Expressman in city

Continuous jurisdiction

(1) Public utilities commission has continuing jurisdiction over railroad rates, fares, and charges—Pittsburgh & L. E. R. Co. v. Public Utilities Commission of Ohio, 191 N.E. 467, 128 Ohio St. 388.

(2) Under L. O. L. § 6906, the matter of a railroad's rates is continually under the scrutiny of the public service commission in the exercise of a flexible, administrative authority, and can be reopened at any time, either on its own motion or the petition of interested parties.—Hammond Lumber Co. v. Exoneration from long and short haul provision

The railroad commissioners may consider the application of a railroad company, and determine that for the present and future it shall be relieved of the operation of § 218 of the Kentucky constitution and § 820 of Ky. Statutes, relating to charges for long and short hauls, in the transportation of a particular commodity between certain points—Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Commonwealth, 63 S.W. 448, 23 Ky.L. 544.

75. Ala.—State v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 72 So. 494, 197 Ala. 203.

Formal, affirmative approval required

Under Acts 1907, Sp. Sess., p. 40 § 14½, giving the railroad commission authority to permit preferential industrial rates, in the case of a non-emergency special industrial rate, there must be an affirmative approval of record by the railroad commission, as a condition precedent to the establishment of the rate.—State v. to the exclusion of other persons or corporations under like circumstances.[77]

The authority of a particular board or commission has been held to extend to rates for specific commodities and services,[78] including joint rates,[79] and the rates for various services, such as switching,[80] spotting cars for weighing,[81] dipping cattle pursuant to quarantine laws,[82] and stoppage in transit for milling or other change.[83] In fixing freight rates a state regulatory commission has power to regulate the amount of merchandise which shall constitute a transportation carload.[84]

In the establishment of a rate to supersede the one formerly in force, the commission is entitled to change the basis of the measurement of the rate.[85]

(3) Reparation

In some states the commission has power to award reparations for past shipments on the basis that the rates were unreasonable and excessive, and in others it does not have such power.

In the absence of constitutional or statutory authorization, a state regulatory commission has no power to make a reparation order directing a re-

(3) Under Const. art 9 §§ 6, 18, 22, the corporation commission was empowered to fix the rates to be charged by railroads for movement of cars, equipment, and employees of circuses from one point to another within the state and to promulgate rules regulating such services in order to prevent extortion and unfair discrimination.—Atchison, T & S. Charges for dipping cattle

The dipping of cattle in vats by a railroad company transporting them from points below the quarantine line to points above it, under quarantine regulations prescribed by law, is so involved in the carriage of such cattle as to constitute a part of the carrier's public service, and the corporation commission has power to fix a reasonable charge to be paid by shippers to the carrier for the dipping of cattle brought above the quarantine line before delivery.—Midland Valley R Co. v. State, 130 P. 803, 35 Okl. 672.

fund by a carrier to a shipper or a consignee of an overcharge for freight.[86]

In a number of states the commission cannot award reparation on the basis that the rates charged were unreasonable and excessive;[87] ordinarily, this is true where the charges, when made, were in accordance with rates fixed or approved by the commission.[88] In such cases, the commission's determination that an existing tariff is unreasonable affects only future rates and operates prospectively only and not retroactively,[89] and reparation cannot be awarded for a period prior to the time the carrier received notice that a rate formerly approved by the commission was now deemed excessive.[90] However, in some of these states the commission is entitled to order reparation where the rate was not fixed by the commission but was made by the carrier in the exercise of its own discretion,[91] or where no rate was prescribed by the commission at the time the charge was made and thereafter the commission established a rate lower than that charged by the carrier,[92] or where the carrier makes a charge for a service in excess of the rate fixed,[93] the rule being that a provision authorizing the commission to order reparation when a rate or charge collected is excessive, permits the commission to order a reparation only where the carrier has collected rates or charges in excess of those fixed and prescribed by the commission.[94] Also, in at least one state, the state commission may award a certificate of reparation in cases where the rates exacted were filed with the commission and perfunctorily approved by it without a hearing and determination of their reasonableness, and where they are subsequently found to be unjust, unreasonable, or otherwise unfair and discriminatory against the shipper; but where the carriers have exacted rates pursuant to a hearing and deliberative order of the commission, reparation cannot be awarded.[95]

In other states, the regulatory commission has power to establish retroactive rates and to award reparation for shipments made prior thereto.[96] In some of these states, the jurisdiction of the commission does not extend to cases in which the shipper seeks an award for charges in excess of the established rate, where the reasonableness of the established rate is not in issue;[97] but in others the regulatory commission has authority, after a proper investigation, to order a refund of such overcharges.[98] It has been held, however, that the commission has no jurisdiction to order a refund of charges collected in violation of a statute prohibiting a carrier to charge more for a short than a long haul, since the overcharge, if made, was unwarranted as a matter of law and constitutes a legal question with which the commission can have nothing to do;[99] but it is held in another jurisdiction that a greater charge for a short than for a longer haul is an overcharge, or a charge of more than is permitted by law, concerning which the regulatory commission is entitled to hear complaints, even though such charge is in accordance with the published tariff schedules.[1] Statutes authorizing a regulatory commission to award reparation or order a refund of overcharges are not in violation of the state or federal constitutions.[2]

Constitution construed to permit refund

Const. art 9 § 23, is not an inhibition denying authority to pass L 1913 c 10 § 1, authorizing the corporation commission to find the amount of illegal unwarranted and discriminatory charges made by transportation and transmission companies for holding commodities and ordering a refund, since Const. art 9 § 35, gives the legislature power after the second Monday in January, 1909, to alter, amend, revise, or repeal §§ 18 to 34, inclusive, of such article—Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. State, 206 P. 236, 85 Okl 223.

Limitations on right to award reparations

The only demand for reparation which the commission may entertain is a demand for damages resulting from violation of the commission's orders, so that where public service commission had never made any rules or regulations relating to switching of cars at station involved, or determined what shipper should be paid by carrier for performing switching services at such station, commission was without jurisdiction to entertain shipper's demand for reimbursement for switching services performed at such station.—Parker Gravel Co v Louisiana Public Service Commission, 162 So. 64, 182 La. 524.

Where in an action by a carrier to set aside an order of a regulatory commission reducing rates, the order is suspended during the pendency of the action, on the carrier giving bond, and the carrier collects the rate in effect prior to the order, if the order of the commission is affirmed the remedy of a shipper to recover the amount he was overcharged is by an action on the bond in a court of competent jurisdiction, and not by proceedings before the regulatory commission.[3]

§ 279. Power of Federal Government to Fix or Regulate Rates

The federal government has the power to fix or regulate interstate rates, and to fix and regulate intra-state rates in so far as necessary to prevent their interference with interstate rates, which power has been vested in the interstate commerce commission to the extent that the commission has power to require that the rates initiated by the carriers are reasonable.

The federal government under the constitution has inherent power to regulate interstate rates,[4] and rates on traffic in and among the territories of the United States.[5] Even contracts between private parties and common carriers fixing compensation to be paid for transportation, although made under federal authority, are made subject to the right of the federal government to modify or annul them under the sovereign power to regulate rates.[6] Although the supervision of interstate rates is fully conferred upon the interstate commerce commission by various congressional acts, yet power is not conferred upon it to prescribe and establish railroad tariffs of rates to govern in the future; power to initiate interstate rates, as appears supra § 277 a, is left to the carrier, subject to the power of the interstate commerce commission to suspend, or after hearing, to set them aside, when shown to be unreasonable, and tariffs are framed by the railroads and filed with the interstate commerce commission, and become effective unless suspended or set aside by the commission.[7] However, as appears in the C.J.S. title Commerce § 143, also 12 C.J. p 125 note 61–p 126 note 81, the interstate commerce commission, although not entitled to fix interstate rates in the first instance, does have the power to determine the reasonableness of interstate rates initiated by the carriers, and, if it finds them unreasonable, to prescribe what rates or the maximum or minimum rates to be charged. The Transportation Act of 1920 does not give to the interstate commerce commission the power to regulate intra-state rates generally, but only in so far as may be necessary, under the paramount power of congress efficiently to regulate interstate commerce,[8] and, as appears infra § 376, to remove an existing discrimination against interstate commerce.

Effect of varying terms of contract
To enforce a rate claimed to be established by a contract between express company and railroad company, the decree must follow the contract in its entirety, and any substantial variation therefrom, and substitution quired to do so[10] Courts may inquire into the reasonableness of rates, and if found unreasonable restrain their enforcement.[11] They may not, however, as an original question exert authority over rates,[12] but the tariff must first be fixed so that the courts may be able to judge therefrom whether or not it is reasonable and proper or excessive;[13] nor, on deciding that rates fixed by statute or a railroad commission are unreasonable and confiscatory, can the courts revise such rates and prescribe other rates.[14] So far as interstate carriers are concerned, an order by a court fixing the maximum rate and enjoining the carrier from demanding more than the rates so established would in effect deprive the carrier of the right to fix its rate in the first instance and to change the same, which power is conceded to the carrier by the Interstate Commerce Act.[15]

Operation at a loss. Whether a carrier shall run some parts of its line at a loss, perhaps with a view to future development or future gain, perhaps with a view to greater public service, the loss to be made up from the profits on the operation of other parts of its line, is a business question to be determined by the carrier subject to the control of the regulatory commission.[16]

§ 281. Reciprocal Rights of Public and Carrier in Respect of Service and Rate of Compensation

The rights of carriers and the public with respect to rates are reciprocal, the carrier being entitled to a fair return on the value of its property devoted to the public use and the shipper to a rate not in excess of the value of the services rendered.

The rights of carriers and the public with respect to rates are reciprocal.[17] A carrier is entitled to just compensation.[18] It is entitled to ask a fair return on the value of that which it employs for the public convenience.[19] A rate must yield the carrier a reasonable return on the class of traffic to which therefor, of the court's judgment, would be the fixing of the rate by the court in usurpation of a legislative function—Missouri, K. & T Ry. Co of Texas v. Empire Express Co., Tex Com.App, 221 S W. 590, reversing, Civ App, 173 S.W. 222.

Right protected by constitution

(1) The right of a carrier to just compensation, that is, a reasonable return on the value of its property

it applies.[20] Considerations of public interest cannot be invoked as a ground to compel a carrier to maintain a rate denying it proper compensation.[21] If a railroad is not ill conceived, greater in extent than it should be, or unduly expensive in construction, and is operated wisely and economically, rates producing no more than a reasonable return on its fair value would not be unjust to anyone.[22] The fact that a new road was built without expectation of an immediate realization of a fair return on the investment does not justify disallowance of such return if it can be earned without exaction of unreasonable rates.[23] On the other hand, shippers are entitled to reasonable rates.[24] The public is entitled to demand that no more be exacted from it than what the services rendered are reasonably worth.[25] The carrier must render adequate service at the lowest rates possible consistent with a fair return on its property.[26] The rate should be high enough to provide the user reasonable service.[27] Neither the legislature nor a commission acting under such authority can establish arbitrarily, and without regard to justice and right, a tariff of rates for transportation, which is so unreasonable as practically to destroy the value of property of persons engaged in the carrying business on the one hand,[28] or so exorbitant and extravagant as to be in utter disregard of the rights of the public for the use of such transportation on the other;[29] nor can the carrier make rates which are oppressive to those who by necessity are compelled to employ its service.[30] Reasonable compensation for the service actually rendered is all that a carrier is permitted to exact, either at common law or under statutes specially regulating the subject.[31] Carriers have no right to regulate their charges in proportion to the used in the public service, is protected by constitutional safeguards, which may not be overridden by legislative enactment or considerations of public policy.—City of Paducah v. Paducah Ry. Co., Ky., 43 S.Ct. 335, 261 U.S. 267, 67 L.Ed. 647.

(2) State may not, through unreasonable regulation of railroad, prevent it from obtaining a fair return on the property used in the public service without violation of constitution of the United States.—Delaware & H R. Corporation v. Public Service Commission, 281 N.Y.S. 155, 245 App.Div. 66, affirmed 200 N.E. 298, 270 N.Y. 519.

Zone of reasonableness

Zone of reasonableness exists between maxima, beyond which charges are excessive, and minima, beyond which charges are too low.—U. S. v. Chicago, M., St. P. & P. R. Co., Ill., 55 S.Ct. 462, 294 U.S. 499, 79 L.Ed. 1023, affirming, D.C., Chicago, M., St. P. & P. R. Co. v. U. S., 8 F.Supp. 970.

Rate entailing exhaustion of capital

The public cannot require of a public service corporation the continued operation of its property under rates which would afford, not only no adequate return on the capital invested, but would entail a large continuing loss and the eventual exhaustion of the entire capital.—Charleston-Isle of Palms Traction Co. v. Shealy, D C.S C., 266 F. 406.

Increase held proper

When the evidence submitted in support of the new rate established that the company was not receiving a revenue sufficient to earn a proper return on the minimum valuation fixed in the former determination, and that the income from the new rate would not exceed its allowable gross revenue, an order permitting the filing of a new schedule is reasonable and in conformity with law.—City of Philadelphia v. prosperity which attends industries whose products they transport.[32] It happens not infrequently that the reciprocal rights under consideration cannot stand together, and for obvious reasons the right of the carrier must yield to the right of the public in that event.[33] In other words, the reasonable value of the services may be insisted on, even though charges so limited would fail to produce a fair return to the carrier on its investment.[34] If, for any reason, the carrier's business cannot reasonably be so conducted as to render a profit, the loss must fall on the carrier.[35] Easily understood applications of the principle occur where, in construction or purchase, more money has been put into a plant than is required for one adequate to the demands of the community in which such plant is located;[36] where the plant has been built at an extravagant and wasteful cost, or is not well adapted to the uses for which it was intended;[37] where the construction was at a time when material and labor were at the highest price, so that the actual cost far exceeds the present value;[38] or where there is great waste and extravagance in the management of the carrier's property.[39]

§ 282. Reasonableness of Rates in General

a. Reasonable rate defined
b. Necessity that control be reasonable

a. Reasonable Rate Defined

A reasonable rate is one which is just to the carrier and to the shipper, but if it is higher or lower than the services are worth it is unreasonable. The question of reasonableness is one partaking of both a legislative and a judicial aspect.

A just and reasonable rate is one which is just to the carrier and to the shipper.[40] Ordinarily, a rate is "unreasonable, unjust, oppressive, and unlawful," where it does not fairly compensate the carrier for its services,[41] or where it is more than a fair compensation for the services rendered or constitutes an unjust discrimination.[42] A rate cannot include charges for services which are separate and distinct from the transportation service and rendered only in connection with certain parts of the service and not in all cases.[43]

Whether or not a rate is reasonable is a problem with a double aspect, legislative and judicial.[44] From the legislative standpoint that rate or return is reasonable which is not unfair to the shipper, and at the same time is large enough to meet the demands of legislative policy in promoting and encouraging railroad investments. The legislative administrative board takes into account the risk involved, the community service rendered, past or prospective unprofitable periods, and all other elements tending to determine what a wise policy may be, and it may well fix a rate contemplating a return much beyond the legal rate of interest for the money invested; in other words, from this point of view a very liberal return may be reasonable.[45] On the other hand, it cannot judicially be said that a rate is unreasonable unless it yields less than that minimum return which the invested capital has a right to demand; in other words, that increment which is so inherently incidental to the investment that destroying the increment is a confiscation of the property.[46]

laration that rates below the maximum are reasonable.[47]

b. Necessity That Control Be Reasonable

Control of rates must be reasonable and such as to insure reasonable rates.

Railroad companies are not subject to the absolute control of the legislature as to rates for transportation;[48] and regulatory commissions may not lawfully compel railroads to reduce their rates below a reasonable level.[49] While a state, in prescribing rates for intra-state traffic, may make reasonable classifications of business[50] and may exercise a wide discretion in prescribing reasonable rates,[51] the control exercised must be reasonable and must afford just and reasonable compensation for the services performed and for the use of the property devoted to the business.[52] General power to legislate on the subject of rates and charges confers no right to take away or destroy the property or to annul the contracts of the carrier with third persons.[53] The state may not select a particular class of traffic for arbitrary control and regulation;[54] and under the pretense of regulating rates, the state cannot require a common carrier to carry persons or property without reward, nor can it do that which in law amounts to a taking of private property for public use without just compensation or without due process of law.[55] However, while the enforcement by a state of a general scheme of maximum rates so unreasonably low as to be unjust and unreasonable may be confiscation and amount to taking property without due process of law, the state has power to compel a railroad company to perform a particular and specified duty necessary for the convenience of the public, even though it may entail some pecuniary loss,[56] and the fact that state statutes fixing railroad rates are not enforceable as to particular railroads, because the rates as applied to such roads are not compensatory, does not render them invalid as to other roads.[57]

§ 283. Determination of Reasonableness

a. In general
b. Proceedings

a. In General

In general, the power to determine the reasonableness of rates is vested in regulatory commissions before whom the reasonableness of a rate must be tried before it can be tested by the courts. Statutory methods for determining the reasonableness of rates must be followed and such methods generally prescribe some proceeding for directly attacking the rate, collateral attacks not being allowed.

The matter of determining the reasonableness of rates for interstate transportation, filed with the interstate commerce commission, is primarily with such commission,[58] which is a tribunal created by the government to hear, investigate, and report on the reasonableness of rates, and to attempt the correction of inequality and injustice therein;[59] and in the case of intra-state transportation, it is primarily with the legislature or with bodies acting under its authority.[60] The authority of a state to prescribe what shall be reasonable charges for intrastate transportation is state wide unless it is limited by the exertion of the constitutional power of congress with respect to interstate commerce and its instruments.[61] Ordinarily, the power to fix or approve a reasonable rate is vested in a state board or commission,[62] which board or commission also has the power and duty to determine whether rates fixed by a carrier under a power conferred by its charter conform to the power and classification provided therein,[63] and where the carrier fails to fix its rates in the manner provided by its charter it may still submit a schedule of rates to the commission for approval, which if approved become effective the same as rates submitted to the commission by other carriers become effective on such approval.[64]

A rate established by the commission is subject to revision only in the mode provided by statute,[65]

Only issue

In rate proceeding, only question is whether rates are unjust or unreasonable and will be for future.—Centre County Lime Co. v. Public Service Commission, 96 Pa.Super. 590.

Determination of zone lines

Determination where line should be drawn prescribing tariffs on same commodity for different zones, is largely administrative and for public service commission.—American Lime & Stone Co. v. Public Service Commission, 100 Pa.Super. 158.

Wisdom of group system

Wisdom of group system of making freight rates for coal from mines and fixing boundaries of various groups are administrative questions for commerce commission.—Illinois Commerce Commission v. Chicago & E. I. Ry. Co., 163 N.E. 664, 332 Ill. 243.

Effect of federal guaranty period

Transportation Act did not require conditional approval by interstate commerce commission to enable the state commission to entertain complaint against intra-state rate during six months' guaranty period ending September 1, 1920, but the federal commission merely acted as a reviewing body on the determination by the state commission and was required to approve it to make it effective.—Missouri, K. & T. Cancellation because misleading

Where misleading symbol was used indicating reduction in charges would result from tariff, when in fact the tariff would increase the charges, the department of public works properly dismissed proceeding and canceled tariff.—North Pac. Coast Freight Bureau v. Department of Public Works, 286 P. 86, 156 Wash. 137.

Function of commission

In fixing reasonable railroad freight rates, public utilities commission applies the statutory rule fixed by the legislature, its function being to ascertain facts on which statutory rule becomes operative.—Sparta Foundry Co. v. Michigan Public Utilities Commission, 267 N.W. 736, 275 Mich. 562.

Regulation requiring approval of rate advance

Order of corporation commission that railroads should not advance freight or passenger rates until advance be approved by commission, is a reasonable exercise of power of commission conferred by Const. art. 9 § 18, invading no substantial state or federal rights of railroads in violation of Const. U.S. art. 1 § 8 par. 3, and Interstate Commerce Act.—Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. State, 171 P. 43, 67 Okl. 304.

Authority of commission where rates improperly established

State authorities are not compelled to adopt railroad rates where they are not adopted by railroad's directors under power conferred by legislative charter, and, in such case, railroad commission would have power to see that proper rates only are made.—Gulf & S. I. R. Co. v. Laurel Oil & Fertilizer Co., 159 So. 838, 172 Miss. 630, amending and overruling suggestion of error 158 So. 778, 172 Miss. 630 and corrected 160 So. 564, 172 Miss. 630.

Approval of rates

(1) Rates fixed by railroad's directors under power conferred by legislative charter should be certified to railroad commission, which will determine whether rates come within grant of charter and within classification referred to therein, and, if so, commission should approve rates making note of their filing and its approval on minutes.—Gulf & S. I. R. Co. v. Laurel Oil & Fertilizer Co., 159 So. 838, 172 Miss. 630, amending and overruling suggestion of error 158 So. 778, 172 Miss. 630, and corrected 160 So. 564, 172 Miss. 630.

(2) Rates fixed by railroad's directors under rate-making power conferred by legislative charter should be filed with railroad commission and be within statutory classification and limits, and commission's approval should be requested and, if necessary, coerced by mandamus or certiorari.—Gulf & S. I. R. Co. v. Laurel Oil & Fertilizer Co., 158 So. 778, 172 Miss. 630, amended and suggestion of error overruled 159 So. 838, 172 Miss. 630, and corrected 160 So. 564, 172 Miss. 630.

(3) Railroad commission's approval of railroad's rates could be evidenced only by entry on commission's minutes.—Gulf & S. I. R. Co. v. Laurel Oil & Fertilizer Co., 158 So. 778, 172 Miss. 630, amended and suggestion of error overruled 159 So. 838, 172 Miss. 630, and corrected 160 So. 564, 172 Miss. 630.

(4) Railroad commission approving rates fixed by railroad's directors under power conferred by legislative charter need not enter rates on commission's minutes at large at that time, but should refer to rates in some sufficient manner as by number and date or other description that would point public to rates and where they could be seen.—Gulf & S. I. R. Co. v. Laurel Oil & Fertilizer Co., 159 So. 838, 172 Miss. 630, amending and overruling suggestion of error 158 So. 778, 172 Miss. 630, corrected 160 So. 564, 172 Miss. 630.

Revision permitted only by commission or on proper application to court

Erroneous rate can be remedied only by commission, or by application to district court as provided by statute.—Producers' Refining Co. v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. of Texas, Tex.Com.App., 13 S.W.2d 679, affirming Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. of Texas v. Railroad Commission of Texas, Civ.App., 3 S.W.2d 489.

and it cannot be attacked at will by any person affected.[66] Ordinarily, a rate cannot be collaterally attacked in a judicial proceeding,[67] as in a common-law action,[68] or an action to recover excess charges.[69] Although it is held in at least one state where the regulatory commission has power to fix rates, that when it establishes a rate it necessarily finds that such rate is not unreasonable, and it is not necessary to submit the question of the reasonableness of the rate to the commission prior to testing it in the courts,[70] under the law as it exists in a number of jurisdictions, a question as to the reasonableness of a rate must first be submitted to the state commission, and, prior to its submission, a court is without jurisdiction to consider its reasonableness.[71]

Rates fixed by a state commission are conclusively presumed to be reasonable, just, and not discriminatory, until declared otherwise by a court of competent jurisdiction,[72] and subject to any right which may exist of appeal from the decision of the commission, or other prescribed method of review, the courts are precluded from questioning their reasonableness.[73] Under statutes authorizing a state commission to investigate rates and determine their reasonableness and establish reasonable rates to take effect in the future, the commission cannot determine the reasonableness of rates previously charged according to the then existing tariff.[74] The cause which induced the commission to investigate the rates does not affect the validity of the rates it fixes.[75]

Statutes authorizing a taxpayer to bring suit to test the reasonableness of rates of public utilities, including carriers, are remedial in nature and should be liberally construed.[76]

Commission's determination conclusive

Railroad commission's determination that freight rate is fair and reasonable is conclusive until set aside by courts in statutory manner.—Producers' Refining Co. v. Missouri, K. & T. Ry. Co. of Texas, Tex.Com.App., 13 S.W.2d 680, affirming Missouri, K & T. R Co. of Texas v. Railroad Commission of Texas, Civ.App, 3 S. W.2d 489, affirmed Producers' Refining Co. v. Missouri, K & T. Ry. Both shipper and carrier bound Orders of railroad commission promulgating rates, if within jurisdiction of commission, are binding on both shipper and carriers.—Texas Steel Co. v. Fort Worth & D. C. Ry. Co., Civ.App., 45 S.W.2d 794, certified questions answered, 40 S.W.2d 78, 120 Tex. 597.

Court must apply tariff prescribed

In controversy over freight charges, court cannot inquire whether railroad commission tariff is just, reasonable, or otherwise proper as proposition of administrative scientific rate making, and must apply tariff prescribed for shipment in question —Reinschmidt v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 160 So. 69, 118 Fla. 237.

Orders without notice or hearing

That railroad commission's orders, regular on their face, were allegedly made without notice to railroads or shipper, without hearing or having case docketed, and under agreement with interstate commerce commission, does not render orders void and subject to collateral attack.—Texas Steel Co. v. Fort Worth & D. C. Ry. Co., 40 S.W 2d 78, 120 Tex. 597, answering certified questions, Civ. App., 45 S.W.2d 794.

Unreasonableness or grounds not going to legality

Tariff cannot be collaterally attacked for unreasonableness after it is prescribed in due form of procedure by railroad commission, nor attacked as matter of law on grounds not going to legality of procedure by which railroad commission arrived at tariff —Reinschmidt v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 160 So. 69, 118 Fla. 237.

b. Proceedings

Proceedings before a regulatory commission must follow statutory rules as to the procedure to be followed. Requirements as to the time within which a complaint may be filed, the necessity for notice, the form of the complaint, the evidence admissible, the findings required, and the order to be made must be followed.

In its investigation and determination as to the reasonableness of rates, a state board or commission must follow the procedure and rules prescribed for it by the legislature in order to give validity to its action,[77] but it may waive its own rules as to procedure.[78]

Ordinarily, investigations must be based on a written complaint either originating from the commission itself or from some interested party, and the defendants or parties interested have the right to file answers thereto,[79] and the evidence should be limited by the issues made.[80] The complaint must be filed within the time, if any, fixed by law,[81] and requirements as to notice should be complied with.[82] Strictness of pleading is not requir-

77. U.S.—Northern Pac Ry. Co. v Baker, D.C.Wash, 3 F.Supp 1.

Action by part of board

Where board of railroad commissioners, acting under L 1919 cc 192, 194, conducted a hearing on an application by carriers, attended throughout by only one member and a part of the time by two members, and thereafter discussed the application at a meeting, but took no vote, and where a claimed agreement was reached, but its minutes did not show what action, if any, was taken, a subsequent order under seal, signed by its secretary, disposing of application, released on an understanding with one member, was void for want of proper action by board.—State v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 179 N.W. 378, 46 N.D. 313.

Discontinuance

Railroad commission, failing to enter on its minutes order continuing proceeding to revise tariff charges after motions to adopt certain rates were lost for lack of seconds, finally discontinued cause, and could not revise charges at subsequent meeting without ten days' notice to railroads —Mississippi Railroad Commission v. Gulf, M. & N. R. Co., 155 So. 212, 170 Miss. 724.

Continuance

(1) Utilities commission may be empowered to allow continuance to applicant for change of tariff schedules to advertise in counties where publication was not theretofore made. —Liberty Highway Co v. Public Utilities Commission of Ohio, 172 N. E. 376, 121 Ohio St. 623.

(2) Allowance of month's continuance to applicant for change in tariff schedules to permit further publication has been held not unreasonable nor unlawful —Liberty Highway Co. v. Public Utilities Commission of Ohio, supra.

Rehearing

(1) Neither public service commission nor court can disregard statutory provisions and extend time for filing petition for rehearing with respect to order fixing rate; nor can such time be extended by agreement of the parties.—G. Ittenbach Co. v. Cleveland, C, C & St. L Ry. Co., 181 N.E. 382, 97 Ind.App. 332.

(2) The order of public service commission fixing intra-state rates, unless challenged as provided by statute, became final after thirty days —G Ittenbach Co. v Cleveland, C, C. & St. L. Ry. Co., supra.

78. N.Y.—City of New York v. Nixon, 183 N.Y.S. 6, 111 Misc. 224.

Form of application

The public service commission may waive the requirements of its rules as to the form of an application by a carrier for permission to put new rates into effect.—City of New York v. Nixon, 183 N.Y.S. 6, 111 Misc. 224

79. Ill.—Alton & S. R Co. v. Illinois Commerce Commission, 147 N.E. 417, 316 Ill. 625.

Agreement between board and carrier

(1) Where the statutes so provide, the state board or commission may fix just and reasonable rates after hearing on notice, or the carrier may fix its rates and the board or commission hear and determine whether the rate fixed by the carrier is just and reasonable, and it is proper for the carrier to petition the board or commission and ask its consent to an increase of rates instead of increasing the rates and then waiting for the board or commission to act.— O'Brien v Board of Public Utility Com'rs, 105 A 132, 92 N.J.Law 44, affirmed 106 A. 414, 92 N.J Law 587.

(2) Contention of prosecutor that board cannot proceed to fix rates without evidence or a hearing, even under Public Utility Act § 17 (h), cannot be sustained, since the same result would follow mere inaction on the part of the board.—O'Brien v. Board of Public Utility Com'rs, supra.

Statement of examiner insufficient to enlarge issue

Where complaint to commerce commission had been amended to eliminate charge of unreasonableness of rates, statement of examiner did not enlarge issue —Illinois Cent. R. Co v. Illinois Commerce Commission, 173 N.E. 804, 342 Ill 11

80. Ill.—Alton & S. R. Co. v. Illinois Commerce Commission, 147 N. E. 417, 316 Ill. 625.

81. Time of filing held sufficient

Complaint that proposed new freight rates are unreasonable need not be filed before they become effective, in order to authorize utilities commission to investigate.—S. D. Warren Co v Maine Cent. R. Co., 135 A. 526, 126 Me 23.

82. U.S.—Southern Pac Co. v. Bartine, D C Nev. 1 F 2d 323.

Parties entitled to notice

Only notice required to be given of hearing before railroad commission is that given to railroad companies whose interests are affected, shippers, localities, and others who may be affected or interested are not required to be given notice.— Houston Chamber of Commerce v. Railroad Commission of Texas, Civ. App., 19 S.W 2d 583, affirmed Railroad Commission of Texas v. Houston Chamber of Commerce, 78 S.W.2d 591, 124 Tex. 375

Strictness not required

(1) Respecting notice of proceedings before railroad commission to fix rates, same strictness is not required as in judicial proceedings.— Gulf & S I R. Co. v. Laurel Oil & Fertilizer Co., 158 So. 778, 172 Miss. 630, amended and suggestion of error overruled 159 So 838, 172 Miss. 630, corrected 160 So. 564, 172 Miss. 630.

(2) Statute governing service of notice of railroad commission's proceedings is merely directory, notice being sufficient if served so as to be received by railroad's officer having charge of matter before commission, or officer whose duty it would be to transmit notice to proper officer—Gulf & S I. R. Co. v. Laurel Oil & Fertilizer Co, supra.

Retention of jurisdiction

The public utilities commission cannot, by declaring that it retains jurisdiction of the matter in which it makes a complete order fixing railroad freight rates, in response to an application pending before it, defeat the necessity of giving the thirty days' notice required by Gen.St. 1915 § 8341, in a subsequent proceeding in the same matter to cancel the

ed,[83] and the pleading should be liberally construed, but, although no particular form is required, there must be a statement of the thing which is claimed to be wrong sufficiently plain to put the carrier on its defense.[84] All parties must be fully apprised of the evidence submitted or to be considered, and must be given opportunity to cross-examine witnesses, to inspect documents, and to offer evidence in explanation or rebuttal.[85] The hearing may be held before a qualified officer of the commission who need not necessarily be a commissioner or assistant commissioner.[86]

Findings. In some states detailed and specific findings of fact are not required, but a basic or essential finding that the existing rates are unreasonable is all that is required.[87] In other states specific findings of fact are mandatory,[88] and must be in direct and certain language, sufficiently clear as to leave no misunderstanding as to their meaning and purport,[89] and the failure of the board or commission to make the required findings will invalidate its order.[90] The findings must be based on evidence presented in the case.[91]

Order of commission. In some states the commission may frame its orders as the substantial justice of the case requires, irrespective of the relief asked for in the petition.[92] In others, however, the hearings of the commission and the orders entered order first made, in view of §§ 8345, 8398, and 8433—State v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry Co., 197 P. 192, 108 Kan. 847.

Notice held sufficient

In shipper's action for overcharges, railroad commission's notice, mailed to person maintaining office in adjoining state and acting as assistant freight agent of defendant railroad and two other railroads, one of which had leased defendant railroad, was held sufficient, and hence defendant was bound by rate order made at meeting which such agent attended as part of his duties—Gulf & S I R Co. v. Laurel Oil & Fertilizer Co., 158 So. 778, 172 Miss. 630, amended and suggestion of error overruled 159 So. 838, 172 Miss 630, corrected 160 So 564, 172 Miss. 630.

Complaint held sufficient

Shipper's complaint alleging rates and charges were, when exacted, and still are, unjust and unreasonable, in violation of Gen.Code § 504, raises issue of reasonableness of charge—Cleveland Provision Co. v. Public Utilities Commission, 135 N.E. 612, 104 Ohio St. 253, 23 A.L.R. 404.

Expense of cleaning cars

Where, in proceedings before the state public utilities commission, the carriers offered their evidence on the theory that they were entitled to include in the charge for cleaning and disinfecting stock cars the expense incurred in the ordinary cleaning, a decision of the commission adverse to this contention did not deprive them of their right to show what would be a reasonable and adequate charge for the additional service required by an order of the state board of live stock commissioners, and hence the commission, before attempting to fix rates for cleaning cars, should have required the carriers to make such proof.—State Public Utilities Commission v. Atchison, T. & S F Ry. Co, 116 N.E. 696, 279 Ill. 194.

Wash—Great Northern Ry. Co. v Department of Public Works of Washington, 296 P. 142, 161 Wash 29.

Sufficiency of findings required

Findings by commerce commission in reducing rates must be sufficiently specific to enable courts to determine whether decisions are based on findings—Chicago & E I. Ry. Co. v Illinois Commerce Commission, 173 N E. 380, 341 Ill 277.

Finding held sufficient

(1) Where commerce commission, in its order, referred to evidence introduced by complaining shipper and found it insufficient to show rate complained of was unreasonable and stated reasons for finding, it was unnecessary for commission to make any other finding on such part of case—Moline Consumers' Co. v. Illinois Commerce Commission ex rel. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 187 N E. 161, 353 Ill. 119.

(2) On shipper's complaint against joint through rate, commerce commission's finding that certain switching rates referred to by shipper for comparison did not reflect cost of service performed was supported by the evidence and was not repugnant to finding that no evidence of cost of service was introduced.—Moline Consumers' Co. v. Illinois Commerce Commission ex rel. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co, supra.

Surplusage not fatal to finding

Where state commerce commission's finding that reciproval switching rates did not reflect cost of service was supported by uncontradicted evidence in record, references in commission's order to holdings and statements of interstate commerce commission that such charges were made without regard to cost of service will be considered surplusage, not to be regarded as the evidence on which the finding was based, so as not to invalidate the finding.—Moline Consumers' Co. v Illinois Commerce Commission ex rel. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co, 187 N E. 161, 353 Ill. 119.

Proper order defined

"Proper order" fixing maximum freight rate is not an order in any prescribed form, but one appropriate to the situation and to carry

therein are limited and circumscribed by the complaint filed, and the commission cannot enter a valid order which is broader than the written complaint filed in the case.[93] It is not essential that the commission dispose of a matter pending before it in a single order, but it may in a proper case make a preliminary disposition of the matter, and reserve for further consideration, and dispose of by subsequent order, other questions or issues involved in the main issue without further notice or hearing.[94] Statutes fixing a date on which orders of the commission relating to rates shall become effective have been held permissive and not mandatory.[95]

The content of an order of a state commission is what is expressly set out in the order or what the order itself incorporates by reference.[96] A report or an opinion of the commission that existing rates are unreasonable, without an order to change them, neither authorizes nor permits a departure from them;[97] but an order to remove an existing discrimination against interstate rates by ceasing to charge higher rates between designated interstate points and designated intra-state points, which includes as a part of the order a finding that the interstate rates are not shown to be unreasonable, impliedly authorizes the carrier to maintain the interstate rates and to raise to their level the intra-state rates involved.[98]

A finding by a state commission in a proceeding brought by a shipper that a certain rate is excessive and an order fixing a lower rate operates generally and inures to the benefit of all shippers similarly situated.[99]

§ 284. Review by the Courts

a. In general
b. Extent and limits of review

a. In General

Parties interested are entitled to a review by the courts of rates established by the legislature or regulatory commission, which review must be in the manner prescribed by the statute, where a statute authorizes a particular method of review.

When the legislature exercises its power to establish rates, the act by which the establishment is effected becomes a law, which the courts have no other choice than to enforce, unless the legislature has exceeded its constitutional authority.[1] However, the action of a legislature, of the interstate commerce commission, or of a state regulatory commission, is not conclusive as to the reasonableness of the rates so fixed. While a carrier has no right to escape the visitorial power of the state to ascertain whether it keeps within its charter rights, carriers are not subject to the absolute control of the legislature as to rates charged for transportaout the findings of the commission. —S. D. Warren Co. v. Maine Cent. R. Co., 135 A. 526, 126 Me. 23.

Order for refund construed

Utilities commission's order to refund collections exceeding maximum freight rate fixed thereby applies only to sums collected under schedules theretofore in effect—S. D. Warren Co. v. Maine Cent. R. Co., 135 A. 526, 126 Me. 23.

93. Ill.—Alton & S. R. Co. v. Illinois Commerce Commission, 147 N. E. 417, 316 Ill. 625.

Reduction limited to territory complained of

Where mining companies filed complaint against railroads for reduction of rates for transportation of coal within a twenty-mile radius of certain center, order of commission reducing rates within thirty-mile radius was beyond commission's jurisdiction and authority—Alton & S. R. Co. v. Illinois Commerce Commission, 147 N.E. 417, 316 Ill. 625.

94. Tex.—Houston Chamber of Commerce v. Railroad Commission of Texas, Civ.App., 19 S.W.2d 583, affirmed Railroad Commission of Texas v. Houston Chamber of Commerce, 78 S.W.2d 591, 124 Tex. 375.

95. Me.—S. D. Warren Co. v. Maine Cent. R. Co., 135 A. 526, 126 Me. 23.

Where no date fixed in order

Utilities commission's order fixing maximum freight rate becomes effective on signing and service, where no date is fixed—S. D. Warren Co. v. Maine Cent. R. Co., 135 A. 526, 126 Me. 23.

96. Ind.—Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Public Service Commission of Indiana, 177 N.E. 260, 202 Ind. 618.

Order of commission construed

Public service commission's order merely extended effective date of order fixing freight rates, and did not affect finality of order fixing rates.—Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Public Service Commission of Indiana, 177 N.E. 260, 202 Ind. 618.

Order held not too indefinite

In a proceeding to review order of public service commission, requiring railroads to establish joint through freight rates, where record does not show that order has been superseded and such order becomes effective in twenty days by Remington Code 1915 § 8626—81, it will be presumed after twenty days that order has been complied with, and such compliance would show that it was not too indefinite to be enforced as contended.—State v. Public Service Commission of Washington, 163 P. 1143, 95 Wash. 376, affirmed State v. Public Service Commission, 166 P. 793, 95 Wash. 376.

tion.[2] The question of whether rates are not so unreasonably low as to deprive the carrier of its property without such compensation as the constitution secures cannot be so conclusively determined by the legislature of the state, or by regulations established under its authority, that the matter may not become the subject of judicial inquiry;[3] and a statute which provides that rates fixed by a railroad commission shall be final and conclusive as to the reasonableness of the rates, and that the question cannot be the subject of judicial inquiry, is void as depriving the carrier of its property without due process of law and as depriving it of the equal protection of the law.[4] The judiciary are the final judges of what is reasonable or of what impairs the right of the corporation to a reasonable compensation for services rendered;[5] and, although a state regulatory commission may have exceeded its jurisdiction in establishing rates, the court of last resort of the state has final jurisdiction to determine the reasonableness of the rates, and one who seeks to review the order is bound by the decree of such court.[6] Thus, the acts of a state commission in establishing rates are subject to review by the courts to determine whether a rate is unreasonable or unjust.[7]

The review must be in the manner prescribed by statute.[8] In a number of jurisdictions, under the statutes therein, an appeal is authorized from orders of railroad commissions fixing rates.[9] In others the courts have jurisdiction to set aside an order of the regulatory commission fixing rates where they are beyond its power or unreasonable and excessive.[10] In some jurisdictions certiorari will not lie to review an order of the railroad commission fixing intra-state freight rates.[11] Where the reasonableness of an established rate has been sustained by the courts, the question of the reasonableness of such rate cannot be litigated in a proceeding to recover from the carrier amounts exacted in excess thereof.[12]

An appeal must be taken within the time allowed by the provisions of the statute authorizing it,[13] and the steps required to perfect the appeal must be complied with.[14] It is not necessary that a motion for a new trial be filed and presented to the commission, in order to have the court on appeal determine the reasonableness and justness of the order of the commission from which the appeal is

"Any proper party feeling aggrieved may prosecute an appeal therefrom by making application to the chairman of said commission for him, under the seal of said commission, to certify to this court all the facts upon which the action appealed from was based, and which may be essential for the proper decision of the appeal, together with such evidence introduced before or considered by the commission as may be selected, specified, and required to be certified by any party in interest, as well as such other evidence so introduced or considered as the commission may deem proper, and also a written statement of the reasons upon which the action sought to be appealed from is based, to be filed with the record of the case, which will constitute the record for review in this court."—Atchison, etc., R. Co. v. Love, 99 P. 1081, 23 Okl. 192.

prosecuted.[15] An appeal by a carrier from a general order of the commission not directed against any specific company or companies by name will be dismissed when it does not appear from the record that the rates, schedule, facilities, or conveniences of such appellant company are affected by the order appealed from.[16]

In jurisdictions where the reasonableness of rates established by the regulatory commission may be reviewed by the courts in direct proceedings authorized for that purpose, it has been held that such proceedings may be instituted by parties interested in the rates promulgated, whether notified or not,[17] and that the trial in such proceeding is governed by the rules controlling in civil cases generally.[18]

On appeal from an order of the commission increasing rates, the court may permit the enforcement of the increased rates pending determination on the merits of the appeal, where essential to provide the carrier with funds necessary for the continued operation of its lines.[19] A statute requiring that no supersedeas shall be granted in any action or proceeding brought to review an order of the commission refusing to permit an increase in rates, pending final determination thereof, applies to an order refusing to permit an increase under a tariff by canceling the tariff.[20]

Effect of judgment on review. Under a statute making the provisions of a code of civil procedure relating to writs of review applicable to a review by a particular court of the orders of the state regulatory commission, the effect of the judgment of the court on review is precisely the same as provided by the code and the rules of the court in other cases, and the commission has no discretion but to obey the mandate of the court.[21]

Remand. A statute requiring the court, where it finds that the regulatory commission failed to receive evidence properly proffered, to remand the case to the commission with instructions to receive the evidence offered and enter a new order based on the evidence theretofore taken and the new evidence received, unless it appears that such new evidence would not be controlling, does not require the court to remand on an appeal to determine the reasonableness or lawfulness of an order of the commission, where the record does not show that the commission failed to receive any evidence properly proffered, but in such case the judgment of the court on the appeal is a final order confirming or setting aside the order of the commission.[22]

b. Extent and Limits of Review

Broadly speaking, the power of the courts in reviewing rates fixed by a legislative or regulating body is limited to a determination of whether they are confiscatory. They will not, as a rule, determine questions of fact although they may consider the legal sufficiency of evidence and findings; and, further, they may determine whether the legislature or board or commission has acted within its powers.

The courts do not sit as a board of review to substitute their judgment for that of the legislature or of those bodies legally constituted by them to act as to matters within the province of either,[23] and since, as is discussed in § 280 supra, they have no power to fix the rates themselves, they are not authorized to revise or to change a body of rates.[24]

Order held proper

An order of the public service commission refusing to restrain a railroad company from increasing a freight rate on a particular commodity will not be reversed by the superior court, where it appears that the company assumed the burden of proof imposed by the Public Service Commission Act § 4 art. 5 that the evidence produced was duly heard by the commission, and that the order made was within the power of the commission and not unreasonable. —West Virginia Pulp & Paper Co. v. They will not consider the expediency or wisdom of an order relating to rates or whether, on like testimony, they would have made a similar ruling.[25] Nevertheless, the power of the courts to review a schedule of rates is coextensive with the limits of the protection afforded by the constitution.[26] Even so, rate regulation will be reviewed by the courts only in so far as it is necessary to determine whether or not the rate established is so unreasonable and unjust as to cause a practical destruction of property rights or amount to a confiscation of the carrier's property.[27] They may consider whether the rates fixed or approved by the legislature or regulatory commission are confiscatory,[28] and, if they are, may restrain their enforcement;[29] and under some statutes they may hear and determine whether or not an order of the commission fixing maximum rates, or its order declining to change a rate fixed by the carrier, is valid, by ascertaining whether or not the rate so fixed or the rate unchanged was reasonable.[30] Other than this, however, the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the rates prescribed, or whether they were arbitrarily prescribed, is not reviewable.[31] To authorize action on the part of the court, it must clearly appear that the protection afforded by the constitution has in some degree been taken away,[32] and it must be made plainly to appear that the rates ordered are void.[33]

As a general rule, conclusions on a question of fact are not reviewable by the courts,[34] and unless arbitrarily reached without proper consideration of all the facts, or determined on a manifestly wrong basis, will be controlling.[35] Orders of the regulatory board or commission are presumed to be correct,[36] and, unless shown to be otherwise, will be affirmed.[37] Under some statutes the findings of the commission, on appeal, are prima facie true.[38]

Analogous to review of jury verdict

The order reviewed must be based on competent evidence,[39] and the courts must weigh and consider the evidence,[40] but have no power to pass on conflicts of testimony, nor to determine the weight of the evidence in its bearing on the reasonableness of the rate.[41] They are limited in their consideration of the evidence to a determination of whether the order has substantial foundation therein,[42] and if there is substantial evidence supporting the order it will be sustained,[43] even though the evidence is conflicting;[44] but an order indisputably contrary to the evidence, or without evidence, or otherwise not in conformity with the law will be set aside.[45]

A presumption will be indulged that a state railroad commission, in fixing intra-state railroad rates, acted with full knowledge of the situation, and, where the record does not disclose all the evidence, a rate sustained by the highest state court will not be held by the supreme court of the United States to be confiscatory as depriving the railroad company of its property without due process of law, where it appears by the report of the company that the rate exceeds the average rate received by the company during the previous year;[46] nor will the federal courts disturb, on the theory of interference with interstate commerce, an order of a state railroad commission suspending an interstate railway company's supplemental tariff to give the commission an opportunity to investigate where the affidavits are conflicting.[47] So, it has been held that a court of equity should not hold invalid an act of the legislature or of a regulatory commission, fixing maximum rates of a carrier until a fair trial has been made of continuing business under the statute, and the practical result of such rates has been determined.[48]

The courts in reviewing an order of a regulatory commission fixing or determining the reasonableness of a rate have jurisdiction to determine their power to review the order of the commission,[49] and to determine whether the rates have been established in due form of law under a valid law and under a valid commission,[50] and whether the board or commission acted within the scope of its authority.[51] Also, where the state commission determines that rates fixed by a carrier under a power conferred by its charter do not conform to the power and classification provided therein, resort may be had to the courts by the commission or the carrier to determine the question.[52]

In Oklahoma by virtue of constitutional provisions, the court, in reviewing the order of the corporation commission, sits in a legislative and administrative capacity,[53] and is bound by the presumption created by the constitution, that the action of the commission is prima facie reasonable and just, but subject to be rebutted or overcome by the facts in the record as found and weighed by the court on review.[54]

§ 285. Matters Considered in Determining Reasonableness

There is no precise formula for determining a reasonable rate. It must be determined on a consideration of all the facts and circumstances of the particular case.

On own motion

On appeal by railroads from order of public utilities commission reforming switching rates in Denver railway yards, supreme court will take notice of its own motion of jurisdictional question that part of industrial switching carried on between points within city and county of Denver is beyond jurisdiction of public utilities commission.—Atchison, T. & S. Case tried de novo

When an appeal is taken from an order of the corporation commission, fixing a rate to be charged by a public service transportation or transmission company, to the supreme court, it is tried by the supreme court de novo on the record and evidence before the commission or certified by the court, and it is the duty of the supreme court to judicially determine and fix such rate as is just, reasonable, and correct, irrespective of who appeals, so that a cross-appeal is not necessary.—St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. into the consideration;[56] and the final result is to be determined, not from the consideration of a single circumstance, but from a general view of all conditions affecting the transportation,[57] and a consideration of all parties directly and materially affected.[58] All the facts and circumstances must be considered by such appropriate processes and standards of reasoning and computation as are afforded by law, or by common experience, and the dictates of right and justice.[59] A rate just and reasonable when prescribed may become too low, unreasonable, and confiscatory;[60] and it does not necessarily follow that a rate which should be reduced for the future was unreasonable in the past, particularly where it was put into effect in good faith and maintained without challenge for a considerable length of time.[61]

Same tests for minimum rates. No different tests or standards are prescribed for the determination of a just and reasonable minimum rate than for a just and reasonable maximum rate.[62]

Abnormal conditions. Abnormal conditions which will exist for only a brief period of time do not necessarily require a change of rates, but if it is uncertain, and seems improbable, that conditions

Intention to secure rate reasonable to all parties

Rate making for carriers is not a scientific process, but is intended to secure rates which shall be as nearly as possible just and reasonable to all parties concerned, and to provide that all persons shipping similar products under similar circumstances for like distances should be treated alike as nearly as possible, and should not be discriminated against.—Public Service Commission of Washington v. State, 204 P. 791, 118 Wash. 629, 25 A.L.R. 186, affirmed 207 P. 688, 118 Wash. 629, 25 A.L.R. 186.

Need for money

The mere fact that the carrier needs money, entirely apart from the reasons for the need, do not alone determine what are reasonable rates.—Algoma Coal & Coke Co. v. U. S., D.C.Va., 11 F.Supp. 487.

Speculative benefits, standing alone, will not justify interference by a state commission with existing rates otherwise reasonable.—North Hennepin Producers' Ass'n v. Chicago, St. P., M. & O. Ry. Co., 200 N.W. 808, 160 Minn. 506.

Circumstances of particular case determine whether a rate regulation by a state commission is unreasonable.—St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. Co. v. Clark Pressed Brick Co., 192 S.W. 382, 127 Ark. 474.

Entire system

In general, the true test of the reasonableness of a rate is its effect on the entire system, and not whether a particular part thereof is operated at a profit or loss under the prescribed rate.—Milwaukee Electric Ry. & Light Co. v. Railroad Commission of Wisconsin, 177 N.W. 25, 171 Wis. 297.

Existing conditions

The rate must be based on existing conditions.—Illinois Commerce Commission v. Cleveland, C., C. & St. L. Ry. Co., 150 N.E. 678, 320 Ill. 214.—State Public Utilities Commission v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 121 N.E. 260, 286 Ill. 53.

Extent of switching district

A railroad switching district, established for purpose of fixing switching rates, must terminate within reasonable limits, and boundaries should be determined by consideration of all circumstances of particular case including industries located therein, relative mileage, transportation conditions, and commercial competition.—New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Public Service Commission of Indiana, Ind., 199 N.E. 573.

Rate to individual

Whether carrier gave reasonable rates to complainant must be determined by general rules governing powers of rate-making body when determining reasonableness.—Great Northern Ry. Co. v. Department of Public Works of Washington, 296 P. 142, 161 Wash. 29.

Statutory factors

Where a statute designates certain matters which the state commission shall consider in fixing rates, while the commission may not be necessarily limited to such matters, an order of the commission should not stand that does not give full consideration to such matters.—State ex rel. and to Use of Alton R. Co. v. Public Service Commission, Mo.App., 110 S.W.2d 1121, transferred, Sup., 100 S.W.2d 474.

Changed conditions

Where rates fixed by public service commission's order for transportation of coal in carload lots between points in Missouri, where distance involved was ninety-five miles or less, were reasonable and lawful, to authorize change in rates required changed condition which makes original rates unreasonable and unlawful.—State ex rel. and to Use of Alton R. Co. v. Public Service Commission, Mo.App., 110 S.W.2d 1121, transferred, Sup., 100 S.W.2d 474.

Order based on prior order

Order of public utilities commission requiring extension of rate zone, entered without hearing of evidence as to reasonableness or fairness, and made pursuant to void order of railroad and warehouse commission, entered more than two years before, cannot be construed as original order to extend district.—State Public Utilities Commission v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 121 N.E. 260, 286 Ill. 53.

Former error cannot be considered

New order of Illinois commerce commission fixing rate must be based on evidence as to what is presently reasonable rate, without regard to previous error in former orders fixing rates.—Illinois Commerce Commission v. Cleveland, C., C. & St. L. Ry. Co., 150 N.E. 678, 320 Ill. 214.

Reasonableness at time

Order by commerce commission fixing rate must be based on reasonableness at time.—Chicago & E. I. Ry. Co. v. Illinois Commerce Commission, 173 N.E. 380, 341 Ill. 277.

will become more favorable for adequate earnings in the near future, the propriety of emergency rates would seem to be indicated.[63] Evidence that rates fixed by commission were in force for only short period of time during which conditions were abnormal is insufficient to show the rates confiscatory.[64]

Cost and value of service. Freight rates must be fixed with reasonable reference to the responsibility and the cost and value of the service which the carrier and the shipper undertake respectively to assume and render.[65]

Ownership of goods. The fact that the same ownership controls the freight offered and the stock of a railroad company which is a common carrier does not justify the imposition of different rates for proprietary freight and freight independently owned.[66]

§ 286. Value of Property Devoted to Public Service and Methods by Which It Is Determined

a. General rule
b. How determined

a. General Rule

The present fair value of the property being used by a carrier for the convenience of the public is to be considered as a rate base in determining the reasonableness of rates.

In the determination of the reasonableness of rates to be charged by a carrier the fair value of the property being used by it for the convenience of the public is to be considered as a rate base,[67] but it is not conclusive.[68] Such value is to be determined as of the time when the inquiry with regard to rates is being made,[69] but where present values are greatly inflated, due to the transitory conditions arising from a war or the after effects thereof, a valuation based on future price trends and below the present inflated value may be made.[70] Where there is no statutory requirement to that effect the commission is not required in all cases to fix a definite valuation on a carrier's property, whenever there is a complaint against its rates; it may be made when necessary or desirable.[71] So an appraisement of the value of all of a carrier's property is not a prerequisite, when not required by statute, to an increase in intra-state rates of the carrier sufficient to prevent a deficit in operations due to increased taxes and labor cost caused by extraordinary conditions resulting from the na-

Property valued for intra-state rate base

Where the question is as to the profitableness of the intra-state business as a whole under a general scheme of rates, the carrier must satisfactorily prove the fair value of the property employed in its intra-state business and show that it has been denied a fair return on that value.—Northern Pac. Pre-war cost valuation improper

tion being at war;[72] nor is a revaluation of a carrier's property necessary, or even proper, where it was valued for rate making purposes about one year before and there has been no substantial changes in the valuation in the interval.[73] Excessive valuation or fictitious capitalization will not serve as an excuse for excessive rates.[74]

b. How Determined

There is no exact formula for the ascertainment of the fair value of the carrier's property, but there must be a reasonable judgment based on all relevant facts and without any weight being given to speculative factors or factors dependent for their value on the rate being considered.

There is no formula for the ascertainment of the fair value of property used for the convenience of the public, but there must be a reasonable judgment having as its basis a proper consideration of all relevant facts.[75] The valuation of the carrier's property is not intended as a buying and selling price;[76] and in determining the fair value of a carrier's property for rate making purposes such value as is attributable to the property of the carrier by reason of its earnings should not be included, for the reason that the earnings on which the value of the property depends are largely controlled and determined by the rate which is allowed to be charged for the service rendered.[77] A speculative increase of value beyond the value of similar property owned by others, solely by reason of its public character, cannot be allowed.[78] It is the duty of a carrier to keep its accounts as required by the state commission and to render all possible assistance to enable the commission to ascertain the true values of its property, and if it fails to do so it is in no position to complain of the findings of the commission thereon.[79]

Cost of reproduction. It is very generally held that the cost of reproducing the property used by the carrier for the public benefit may be taken into consideration in determining the value of the property.[80] When an estimate of value is based

Effect of statutes

While contention that reasonableness of rates can only be determined by first ascertaining value of property devoted to public service would have some force if § 16 (c), providing for proceedings by the commission adverse to the carrier and authorizing the commission to require the carrier to do what it may not want to do, were the only section of the Public Utility Act applicable, it cannot be sustained, since § 17 (h) provides for increase by public utility itself and subsequent approval by board of public utility commissioners.—O'Brien v. Grade raising

It appearing that expense of grade raising has added to the value of a carrier at least to the amount of the expenditure, it is a proper item of allowance in determining the value of its property for rate-fixing purposes.—Galveston Electric Co. v. City of Galveston, D.C.Tex., 272 F. 147, affirmed 42 S.Ct. 351, 258 U.S. 388, 66 L.Ed. 678.

Contract for electric power

An advantageous contract for the furnishing of electric power to the carrier which permits the carrier to dismantle its plant for the production of electricity is a thing of value to be considered in the fixing of rates.—Duluth St. Ry. Co. v. Railroad and Warehouse Commission of Minnesota, D.C.Minn., 4 F.2d 543, affirmed Railroad and Warehouse Commission of Minnesota v. Duluth Street Ry. on the cost of reproduction new the extent of the existing depreciation may and should ordinarily be shown and deducted,[81] although where an adequate sinking fund for depreciation is maintained sufficient to balance the actual depreciation of the property, and the property is maintained in the highest condition in point of material construction and efficiency, the failure to make deduction for depreciation from reproduction cost is proper.[82] Allowance may be made for construction overhead costs,[83] but interest during construction on the estimated cost of reproduction of railroad property cannot lawfully be allowed,[84] nor can brokerage fees[85] or promotion and consolidation expenses.[86] Ordinarily the reproduction cost new, less depreciation, is the dominant factor in determining the present fair value of the carrier's property for rate-making purposes,[87] and, according to some decisions, it is the fundamental and generally controlling inquiry.[88] It need not, however, be adopted as the exact measure of the present value of a carrier's property,[89] and it has been said that a system of rates and charges that looks to a valuation fixed on so narrow a basis as the cost of reproducing the property, and which permits no account for betterments made necessary by the growth of trade, comes clearly within the constitutional prohibition against depriving any person of property without due process of law,[90] and that courts cannot assume that the cost of reproduction of a line of railroad is what the road has cost up to the time of trial.[91]

Cost of construction. The reasonable cost of construction is to be considered in determining the fair value of the company's property as an element entering into the question of reasonableness of rates,[92] which cost includes all of the elements

Appreciation

Although, in appreciating pre-war costs, to arrive at reproduction value of a street railroad plant, overhead items should not as items be increased in value, yet, since their amount was arrived at by taking a percentage of the physical property when that is appreciated, the overheads must necessarily increase in the same ratio.—Galveston Electric Co. v. Sliding on reproduction cost permitted

Since the weight to be given the different factors in determining the fair value of the property varies with the circumstances of each particular case, the fact that the commission put stress on reproduction cost in a particular case is insufficient to condemn the fair value found as not just and right.—State ex rel. and to Use of City of St. Louis v. Criticism of rule as sole method

The method of ascertaining the present value of railroad property by taking the cost of reproduction less accumulative depreciation, while perhaps the best general method yet devised, cannot be applied in all cases and under all conditions. In its use some important elements of value are ignored, such as density of population and traffic and obsolescence of equipment.—Ann Arbor R. Co. v. Fellows, D.C.Mich., 236 F. 387, appeal dismissed Ann Arbor R. Co. v. Glasgow, 39 S.Ct. 5, 248 U.S. 588, 63 L.Ed. 434.

of fair and reasonable expense in establishing it,[93] including promotion and consolidation expenses,[94] and construction overhead costs.[95] Although in some instances the cost of construction of the carrier's property may determine its present value, as when it is of very recent construction,[96] ordinarily it is of little assistance in that regard.[97] From the cost of construction deduction must be made for depreciation in the condition of the property.[98] Also the community does not underwrite reckless or improvident losses in investments.[99] On the other hand, as the carrier may not be protected in its actual investment if the value of its property is plainly less, so the making of a just return for the use of the property involves the recognition of its fair value if it is more than its cost.[1]

Market value of outstanding securities. While the market value of the carrier's stocks and bonds may be considered in estimating the value of the property,[2] by itself such market value is not an accurate criterion of value[3] or in any sense conclusive on that question,[4] and cannot, except in a very slight measure, indicate what that value is as a matter of fact.[5] Thus evidence that the rates are not a fair return on the amount of the bonded debt, capital stock, and current debts is insufficient to overcome the presumption of reasonableness of the rates adopted, unless it is also shown that the value of the road equals such outstanding liabilities.[6]

Land. In determining the fair value of the carrier's property, the fair market value of land owned by the carrier may be considered.[7]

Easements. In ascertaining the fair value of the property of a carrier for rate making purposes, easements owned by the carrier should be considered.[8] Such easements should be valued at whatever value they have as an interest in real estate,[9] but any value attributable to these easements which might be affected by the rate which the carrier may be allowed to charge, or such value as is dependent on the use which the franchise of the carrier permits the easement to be put, cannot be included.[10]

Working capital. In the ascertainment of the fair value of the property used by the carrier for the convenience of the public, the working capital, that is, the items required to be on hand in the operation of the property, such as materials, supplies and cash, should be considered.[11]

Dividends used for capital outlay. When dividends are fairly earned under the rates allowed, and are declared, such dividends become the property of the stockholders, and, if used to make proper additions to the property, such additions should be considered in adjusting rates.[12]

Going concern value or development cost. In determining the fair value of the carrier's property an allowance may be made for going value or development cost, since a property with its business attached and in successful operation has a greater value than the same property ready to operate, but not operating, and without any attached business,[13] but the cost of developing the carrier system into a financially successful concern based on the capitalized value of the net balance of the operating deficits for the first year cannot be included in determining the base value as a development cost of the system.[14] However, since the reproduction method of valuation presupposes conditions as they now exist, so that the present patronage would be available when the plant is put in operation, no appreciable development cost would be incurred, at least to such a comparatively negligible extent as should exclude its consideration under that method.[15]

Goodwill. Although it has been held that the value of a railroad like that of any other business property may be a matter of growth, and its location, goodwill, and established business are elements to be considered in determining the value,[16] other cases have held that the item of goodwill is not to be considered in determining the value of the property.[17]

Value of franchise. It has been held, although there is authority to the contrary,[18] that in estimating the value of a carrier's property for the purpose of determining the validity of a statute regulating its rates, the carrier's franchise is to be

Basis for allowance

"The allowance in its larger sense is designed to give the owner the benefit of that value that inheres in his plant as an established concern, already operating and earning, with a trained organization, having knowledge of the business, its requirements, and best proven methods for meeting them, and embodying all the experience of the past, with the known results of experiments made, and how best to adapt the business to the changing needs of a growing community."—Houston Electric Co. v. City of Houston, D.C.Tex., 265 F. 360, 362.

Items included

Partly in detail, the development cost embraces preliminary outlays and unrecovered costs in operating the plant itself until a paying business has been established, and subsequently for extensions into sparsely settled territory, until the growth of that particular section affords an adequate return. This cost continues with the continued extension and development of the plant—Houston Electric Co. v. City of Houston, D.C.Tex., 265 F. 360.

Overhead expenses by regular staff properly included

In valuing a carrier and equipment as a basis for fixing rates, preliminary legal, administration, and engineering expenses, claimed as overhead expenses in construction, organization, and development, were improperly excluded, on the theory that this work was done by the company's regular staff and charged to operating expenses, and hence would necessitate a revision of past operating expenses resulting in larger net earnings, as the larger net earnings thus produced would relate to a period when they would not affect present net earnings, and what would have been past profits or "larger net earnings" by a readjustment of operating expenses may not be considered in determining the rate base and whether the present rate is confiscatory.—People ex rel. Reason for rule

Goodwill of company previously consolidated

Rate base valuation of carrier improperly included item representing goodwill of one of companies previously consolidated.—Public Utilities Commission of District of Columbia v. Capital Traction Co., 17 F.2d 673, 57 App.D.C. 85.

Not considered in determining whether rates confiscatory

Although the goodwill and earning power of a business, due to effective organization, are important elements in determining the value as between buyer and seller, and must be compensated for when the public acquires the business, and, like past losses, must be considered in determining whether a rate charged by utility is reasonable, they are not to be included in fixing the base value, for the purpose of determining whether the rates fixed by ordinance are confiscatory.—Galveston Electric Co. v. City of Galveston, Tex., 42 S.Ct. 351, 258 U.S. 388, 66 L.Ed. 678, affirming, D.C., 272 F. 147.

included, and where the state by its tax commission has placed a value on such franchise for taxation purposes, it may fairly be taken by the court as a basis for its findings.[19]

Reserve for depreciation. Money raised by a carrier to pay for depreciation should not be considered as capital on which a return is to be made to the stockholders as dividends in the future.[20]

Assets and property of the carrier not used in the transportation business cannot be included in the valuation as a basis for rate making.[21]

Valuation fixed by carrier. The valuation placed by a carrier on its property is not binding on a railroad commission in estimating the valuation on which it should earn an income, or on which it should fix its rates.[22]

Return of value for purposes of taxation. A sworn return of the value of a carrier's property for the purpose of taxation is some evidence of the value of the property to be considered in determining the rates fixed by the state for carriage of freight,[23] but it is not conclusive on the carrier for that purpose;[24] and, in any event, it cannot be regarded as sufficient evidence as to the value of the property, especially when the principles governing the assessments are not properly shown.[25]

Future price trend. The future price trend or level of prices may be considered in arriving at the fair value of the property.[26]

§ 287. Value of Service to Public and General Public Good

The value of the service rendered and the general public good are proper items to be considered in the determination of the reasonableness of rates, but the effect on an individual shipper or particular member of the public is of little consequence.

As appears supra § 281, the public is entitled to demand that no more shall be exacted from it than the services rendered are reasonably worth, and this right takes precedence even over the right of the carrier to a fair return on its investment when the two rights cannot stand together. In consequence, although the carrier cannot be compelled to maintain on a particular commodity a rate which is less than reasonable, or which is practically gratuitous, on the ground of the public good,[27] even though the carrier is permitted to make up its loss by charges on other classes of traffic,[28] yet the value of the services to the public is an important factor in determining the reasonableness of the rates charged therefor.[29] This, it has been said, is considered an ideal method if not interfered with by competition or other factors, and if it is based on an idea similar to taxation.[30] The general public good may be considered in rate making,[31] and the rate-making body may consid-

Safety, sufficiency and adequacy of service

(1) In view of Public Utilities Act §§ 15, 16 subds. "d," "e," § 17 subds. "b," "h," and § 18 subd. "c" giving authority and jurisdiction to the board of public utility commissioners to control public utilities, fix rates and charges, make regulations, and require, safe, proper, and adequate service, as well as universally recognized business principles, such board may, in determining whether a proposed increase in railway fare is unjust and unreasonable, consider the safety, sufficiency, and adequacy of the service rendered.—New Jersey Central Traction Co. v. Board of Public Utility Com'rs, 113 A. 692, 96 N.J.Law 90.

(2) On application for increase of fare it was proper for the board of public utility commissioners to consider the character of service rendered, and that its being uncomfortable as well as dangerous to passengers materially affected the revenue, and the consideration of such facts was not in violation of Const. art. 1 par. 16, providing against taking of property for public use without just compensation, or of U.S.Const. Amendm. 14, relating to due process.—New Jersey Central Traction Co. v. Board of Public Utility Com'rs, supra.

er the effect that a change in an established rate will have upon the community at large,[32] and a natural and proper development of the country as a whole;[33] and also they should consider its effect upon the maintenance of an adequate system of transportation.[34] The controlling consideration is the relation between the carrier and the general public, not any particular member of it.[35] The effect a rate will have on an individual shipper is of but little consequence, if the rate is reasonable as it relates to the general public.[36] The mere fact that advances in rates on certain goods would be severely felt by certain shippers is not a sufficient reason for holding that the advances were not properly made.[37] Accordingly the demand of the shipper for protection from legitimate competition, domestic or foreign,[38] for unlimited markets,[39] or for the enforcement of equitable estoppels arising from a justifiable expectation that past rates will be maintained,[40] and the demand of the carrier for the maximum rate under which the traffic will move freely[41] must be disregarded. In no event can the reasonableness of rates be determined solely on a consideration of the particular carrier whose rates are directly involved.[42] On the contrary, the rates in a particular territory and the rates of other carriers to be affected by the change in the particular rate or rates in question must be considered.[43]

Effect of rates charged on growth of city. In determining whether the rates charged to and from a city are unjust and unreasonable in themselves, the effect of the rates charged on the growth and prosperity of the city may be considered. However, comparison cannot be made alone with another city where competition has produced unusually low rates, but should be made with other cities where the circumstances and conditions are similar.[44]

§ 288. Earnings

The net earnings of a carrier may be considered in determining the reasonableness of rates where the general level of rates is in issue, but not where the reasonableness of a particular rate is in issue.

Although the reasonableness of rates cannot be based on a consideration of earnings alone,[45] in

Of controlling consideration

Public convenience and necessity are controlling considerations in railroad freight rate hearing for establishment of through route and joint rate, and the public to be considered in establishing grain rates is producer and consumer, and where on such hearing there is no evidence that public convenience and necessity demanded particular order and same contained no finding of public convenience or necessity, circuit court was unwarranted in confirming same.—State Public Utilities Commission v. Interest of individual shipper not sole issue

Carrier's need for funds

Where a railway company's track is unsafe, imperiling life and limb of passengers, and its condition makes riding physically uncomfortable and trains are not run according to schedule, and the equipment is insufficient, such defects diminish the company's revenue, and its excuse for allowing such a situation to exist after having been ordered by the board of public utilities to remedy such defects that it has no money with which to do so is no reason why the railway should be equipped and operated at public expense.—New Jersey Central Traction Co. v. determining the reasonableness of rates, earnings are to be taken into consideration,[46] and it is proper to consider the dividends that have been declared in the recent past under ordinary conditions;[47] but a carrier cannot be required to operate at a loss because large returns were had by the stockholders in prior years,[48] and if, owing to changed conditions, the net earnings of a carrier, properly managed, drop so as not to amount to a fair return upon the fair value of its property, the rate should be increased without imposing impossible or unnecessary conditions.[49] The total net return, however, may be considered only where the general level of rates is in issue, and need not be considered at all where the reasonableness of a particular rate or class of rates is in issue,[50] but the reasonableness of a particular rate or class of rates depends on whether the entire revenue from the particular traffic affords a substantial income for the service over its cost.[51] In considering the validity of a rate prescribed for one class of traffic, a comparison should be made between the cost of handling that particular class of traffic and the revenue derived from the entire traffic in that class, and if it should appear that the rate would compel the carrier to carry the particular class of freight at cost or below the cost of handling it, or so little above the cost of handling as not to amount to a substantial income for the service over the cost of rendering it, the rate is unreasonable. However, the rate is not required to be such as to assure a net profit from every mile, section, or other part into which the road might be divided; the entire traffic in the particular class over the entire line to which the rate applies must be considered in order to determine whether the rate as made is reasonable and proper, and account cannot be taken of each distance to which the

Fair return of operating profit as test

(1) A fair return of operating profit may be used as a standard of reasonableness of rates, when the issue is as to the general level of all the rates received by the carrier—Dayton-Goose Creek Ry. Co. v. U. S., Tex., 44 S.Ct. 169, 263 U.S. 456, 68 L.Ed. 388, 33 A.L.R. 472, affirming, D.C., 287 F. 728.

(2) A carrier owning and operating a railroad, however strong financially, however economical in its facilities, or favorably situated as to traffic, is not entitled as of constitutional right to more than a fair net operating income on the value of its properties which are being devoted to transportation.—Dayton-Goose Creek Ry. Co. v. U. S., supra.

(3) Rates which as a body enable all the railroads, necessary to do the business of a rate territory or section, to enjoy not more than a fair net operating income on the aggregate value of their properties therein economically and efficiently operated, are reasonable from the standpoint of the individual shipper in that section; for each shipper, being interested in having no congestion, is properly required, in the rates he pays, to share in the burden of maintaining adequate railway capacity—Dayton-Goose Creek Ry. Co. v. U. S., supra.

Dividends as capital in considering percentage of profit

Where by the terms of a statute under which a railroad company was organized, no reduction of its freight or passenger rates could be made by the legislature unless its net profits exceeded ten per cent on its capital, stock dividends cannot be considered as capital in determining what profits were made.—Iron Ry. Co. v. Lawrence Furnace Co., 30 N.E. 616, 49 Ohio St. 102.

Distribution of dividends

(2) If dividends paid by traction company to its stockholders were more than a fair return upon property, or were in excess of company's net earnings, it would devolve upon it to make good the deficiency, and render such service as is due public and is required by state railway commission—In re Lincoln Traction Co., supra.

Reason for rule

If the total income of the carrier enabled it to declare a dividend, that would not justify an order requiring it to carry one class of freight for nothing, or for less than a reasonable rate. On the other hand, if the carrier earned no dividend, the railroad commissioners would not be warranted, nor would the corporation be justified, in making an order or fixing a rate unreasonably high on any one class.—State v. Florida East Coast Ry. Co., 73 So. 171, 72 Fla. 379, Ann.Cas. 1918E 1206.

Reasonable net profit immaterial as regards particular rate

That railroad earns reasonable profit on business as whole does not alone justify denying increase in rates for particular service—State ex rel. and to Use of Pugh v. Public Service Commission, 10 S.W.2d 946, 321 Mo. 297.

51. Fla.—State v. Florida East Coast Ry. Co., 73 So. 171, 72 Fla. 379, Ann.Cas.1918E 1206.

However, it has been said that in determining reasonableness of rate fixed by legislative authority on particular commodity, proper test is not whether as to that commodity the rate gives carrier fair compensation after legitimate expenses, but whether on its total freight receipts it can earn enough over operating expenses to give fair and reasonable profit upon its investment.—Alexandria & W. Ry. Co. v. Railroad Commission of Louisiana, 79 So. 863, 143 La. 1067.

rate applies and each item of the schedule declared reasonable or unreasonable accordingly as the revenue derived from that particular haul is greater or less than the cost of handling the freight for that distance.[52] The earnings to be considered are, of course, net earnings. The amount of gross receipts is no criterion for determining the reasonableness of rates; the question of expenses incurred in producing those receipts must be always taken into account, for it is only by striking the balance between the two that it can be determined that the business is profitable.[53] Thus there must be considered the gross income yielded in the operation of the property, and the expenses incurred in such operation,[54] including taxes,[55] repairs,[56] and the interest on a valid bonded debt, contracted in a careful, economical, and honest administration of the carrier's business.[57] However, a schedule of railroad rates established by a state authority is not unreasonably low as to a particular road merely because it will not enable the company to accumulate from its net earnings a sinking fund for the payment of its indebtedness.[58] Earnings of a railroad, applied to the purchase of additional equipment and other improvements, must be regarded as a part of its net earnings on an inquiry as to whether a rate statute is confiscatory.[59] Consideration must be had of the earning capacity of the whole route or road and not of segregated or individual portions of the line.[60] The fair rental value of the dining room, saloon, check stand, etc., privileges in a passenger station must be included in estimating earnings, although the carrier in fact grants such privileges for a merely nominal rental.[61] Income from property devoted to uses other than transportation purposes or uses incidental thereto must be distinguished and accounted for as other earnings,[62] and cannot be considered in determining the reasonableness of the transportation rate.[63]

Contract to furnish freight providing specified earnings. Under a contract providing that the total earnings of freight furnished by defendant to plaintiff carrier should amount to not less than a specified sum each and every year for a stated number of years, the excess of the earnings of freight furnished in one year cannot be credited on deficiencies in other years during the life of the contract.[64]

§ 289. Cost of Plant and Deterioration

In determining what is a reasonable rate, the cost of construction of the system and the amount necessary to provide for the annual depreciation should be considered.

The share of the earnings of a carrier paid to a city for the use of its streets is an overhead expense, to be paid before dividends or interest on invested capital can be estimated, and cannot be included in estimating net earnings to the shareholders for rate-fixing purposes—Chicago Rys. Co. v. Illinois Commerce Commission, D.C.Ill., 277 F. 970.

Income taxes

(1) In determining the net revenue of a carrier in fixing compensatory rates, the amount paid by the company for taxes, including the federal income taxes, is to be deducted from the gross revenues.—Galveston Electric Co. v. City of Galveston, Tex., 42 S.Ct. 351, 258 U.S. 388, 66 L.Ed. 678, affirming, D.C., 272 F. 147.

(2) In determining the sufficiency of carrier fares, the amount paid by the corporation as income tax to the federal government should be considered as a part of the return to the stockholders, who are not required to pay normal income tax on dividends received from the corporation—Galveston Electric Co. v. City of Galveston, supra.

Failure to consider income tax immaterial where earnings adequate

A uniform intra-state tariff rate sufficient to secure to the carriers a six per cent return is not inadequate because the income tax was not included as part of the operating expense in estimating the net income, where the rate as established was sufficient after deducting the income tax to secure to the carriers a five and three-fourths per cent return—Northern Pac. considered in determining the value of the carrier's property; and necessarily it may be considered as an element entering into the question of reasonableness of rates.[65] Where a road or a part of a road is built through a mountainous country or other region, thus entailing expensive construction, the charge may be greater than on other portions of such road, or on other roads, where the cost of construction per mile is less.[66] Cost of construction, however, is not to be deducted from earnings, in ascertaining the reasonableness of rates, for under such rule the public would be compelled to pay for constructing the road without being entitled to its ownership.[67] Expenditures for additions to construction and equipment, like expenditures for original construction and equipment, should be reimbursed by all of the traffic which they accommodate during the period of their duration, and the cost of improvements or additions that will last for many years should not be charged wholly against the revenue of a single year.[68] Also the carrier is entitled to such rates as will not only yield a reasonable return on the value of the property employed, but also such as will provide for absorbing its depreciation.[69] In determining what is a reasonable rate the wear and tear of equipment may be considered,[70] and ordinary repairs and deterioration should be met out of gross earnings, so that each year may carry the burden of its own wear and tear,[71] but deferred maintenance cannot be charged against gross revenues.[72] The proportionate amount required to provide gradually for replacement of property or compensation to the owner at the end of the life of such property should be considered.[73] However, an owner who agrees to maintain and operate a railroad for twenty years after which it is to become the property of another company cannot charge one twentieth of the amount expended by the owner in the construction of the railroad against annual operating revenue in determining the reasonableness of the rates.[74]

Depreciation in the property of carriers, as affecting rates chargeable, means "the loss in value of some destructible property over and above current repairs." — Chicago Rys. Co. v. Illinois Commerce Commission, D.C.Ill., 277 F. 970, 979.

Allowance determined on present value

Allowance for annual depreciation for rate-making purposes must be based on present value.—United Rys. & Electric Co. of Baltimore v. West, 50 S.Ct. 123, 280 U.S. 234, 74 L.Ed. 390, reversing 145 A. 340, 157 Md. 70.

Exclusion of overhead construction items

In determining the depreciation annuity which a carrier can deduct from its gross revenues in estimating the sufficiency of rates based on a percentage of the cost of the property, many of the items of overhead expense incurred in construction of the system may be excluded.—Galveston Electric Co. v. City of Galveston, Tex., 42 S.Ct. 351, 258 U.S. 388, 66 L.Ed. 678, affirming, D.C., 272 F. 147.

portant factor.[76] However, while the cost can be reached approximately, it cannot be reached accurately enough to make this fact controlling.[77] The ratio of total operating expenses to total earnings does not in itself afford a sufficient basis for determining the cost of the transportation of a specified portion of the traffic. Before such a ratio could properly be used in setting forth the cost of a specified portion of the traffic it would be necessary to have evidence either justifying the conclusion that the cost in proportion to the revenue was substantially the same for that part of the traffic as for the whole, or, if there was a material difference, satisfactorily showing its nature and extent.[78]

b. Operating Expenses

The operating expenses of handling the traffic, including a fair proportion of the overhead expenses, should be considered in determining the reasonableness of rates.

The operating expenses, or expense of handling the traffic, should be considered in fixing or determining the reasonableness of rates,[79] since it is only by comparison between the gross receipts and the cost of doing the business that the net earnings can be determined.[80] In determining the cost of the transportation of a particular commodity, all the outlays which pertain to it, including switching and spotting cars for unloading, must be considered.[81] There must also be included its fair apportionment of the general expenses which are applicable to all traffic.[82] So sums paid out by the carrier for taxes[83] or for injuries to persons,[84] and, under the provisions of some statutes, an amortized allowance for

In fixing minimum rates

In fixing minimum rates on specific commodity from different points of origin to common destination, interstate commerce commission may consider peculiarities in transportation which affect general transportation costs.—Jefferson Island Salt Mining Co. v U. S, D C Ohio, 6 F 2d 315.

Switching rate

On complaint of shipper the regulatory commission will not hold a switching charge of seven dollars per car, unreasonable where the undisputed evidence showed the actual expense to the carrier to be in excess thereof.—Cleveland Provision Co. v. Public Utilities Commission, 135 N. E 612, 104 Ohio St. 253, 23 A.L.R. 404.

Rates below transportation cost improper

Coal rates below transportation cost will not be enforced, where such commodity is practically entire tonnage and there is no other commodity from which loss might be recouped.—San Juan Coal & Coke Co. v Santa Fé, S J. & N. Ry. Co, 291 P. 920, 35 N.M. 189

Increase in rate sufficient only to meet increased expenses

(1) Where petition of railway company for increase of rates was granted by board of public utility commissioners, the company cannot complain, although increase was only enough to enable it to meet increased expense forced upon it by order of war labor board of the federal government—O'Brien v Board of Public Utility Com'rs, 105 A. 132, 92 N J. Law 44, affirmed 106 A 414, 92 N J Law 587.

Increase in operating expenses sufficient for rate increase

Marked increase in operating expenses due to rapidly changing general economic conditions is not insufficient basis for conclusion of interstate commerce commission that permitted temporary rate increases would not be excessive, in view of amended statute declaring rule of rate-making.—Algoma Coal & Coke Co v. Comparison with other companies to show mismanagement

In absence of evidence that all businesses of the same nature are mismanaged, there is no better way of determining whether a street railroad is mismanaged, for rate-making purposes, than to compare its operating costs with other businesses of a similar character.—Chicago Rys. Increased expense of operating as test of validity

Increase in cost of operating express business, after ordinance fixing rates for express business was passed, is immaterial as affects validity of ordinance fixing rates, reasonableness or unreasonableness being controlling—City of Chicago v. Mayer, 124 N E 842, 290 Ill. 142.

expenses of litigation[85] may be included in operating expenses; but in ascertaining the cost to, or expense incurred by, a railroad carrier in handling a particular class of traffic, it has been held that interest on bonds and taxes should not be included in the estimate, but they are matters to be considered in determining whether the rate to be enforced provides a reasonable or fair compensation.[86] In ascertaining the cost of operating a railroad, with reference to determining the reasonableness of rates, the expenses of operation are not to be strictly limited to the cost of running trains, excluding all betterments, but the cost of reasonable renewals and improvements of roadbed, track, and equipment should be included in the operating expenses.[87]

When estimating the cost of operating a railway per ton of freight per mile of carriage, for the purpose of determining the reasonableness of a tariff of rates, it is error to take into consideration an amount of the earnings which has been appropriated and paid out as dividends on stock shares of such railroad.[88]

In fixing switching rates to be charged by railroads in terminal yards, the line-haul charges are to be considered and required to bear a part of the burden of the expenses of the yard, because the property devoted to switching is a part of the terminal facilities in use with and really a part of the line itself.[89]

Shipper's services reducing transportation costs. Since it is not contemplated that the charge by a carrier for a particular service shall always be exactly the same to all shippers in establishing rates, the commission cannot consider all the services performed by individual shippers which enable the carriers to transport the product more cheaply and establish rates based on the different services which the individual shippers perform,[90] but they can do so only when they are of such importance that they at once distinguish such shippers from others to an extent sufficient to make them a separate class.[91]

Adjustment of costs to mileage scale. A mileage scale of rates leaves out of consideration the many inequalities in handling costs due to the varied local conditions everywhere encountered in rail transportation. The cost element is adjusted by a general average of cost differences.[92]

Cost of services auxiliary to transportation. General traffic expenses should not be included in determining the charge for a transportation service furnished as an auxiliary to the traffic;[93] and items of expense included in the determination of the line-haul rate should be excluded from consideration.[94] So, in determining the reasonableness of a

Foreign company switching not compelled at a loss

The rule that the line haul should produce part of the revenue due to the terminal property used for switching does not compel the companies who own the terminal to do switching for foreign companies at less than cost if the terminal is considered as partly belonging to the main line, and operated and maintained partly by the revenue from the line haul.—Atchison, T. & S. charge for a service, such as icing, the regulatory commission has a right to consider the elements of cost which the carriers themselves assigned to this charge and to ignore other items which the railroads assigned to the line-haul freight rate;[95] but the regulatory body in substituting for a "stated charge" for refrigeration, because unreasonable, a "cost of ice" basis, must absorb in the substituted charge items of cost covered in the charge abrogated as unreasonable.[96]

§ 291. Mileage

Mileage is an important factor in fixing or determining the reasonableness of rates.

In fixing or determining the reasonableness of rates, mileage is always an important factor[97] to be considered, in connection with all the other facts and circumstances,[98] and it has been said that, "in the absence of other influential circumstances, distance may fairly be considered a controlling element in fixing reasonable rates."[99] Nevertheless it is not necessarily controlling,[1] and it is well recognized that the cost of transportation, per mile, decreases as the length of the haul increases.[2] In fixing a rate, ordinarily it is the shortest route between the points that must primarily be considered to control the rate;[3] and in some states rates must be based on distance.[4] However, where goods are shipped over the longer of two possible routes, and it does not appear that the shorter route is available, or that the carrier whose road comprises part of the shorter route is a party to the proceedings, the regulatory commission should not fix a rate based upon what the rate should be for the shorter route,[5] and in the fixing of rates under a statute requiring them to be based on distance, zones within which certain rates are applicable may be established, and the zones as they are extended may lengthen in distance and may vary in different cases to suit the exigencies of the particular movement of particular goods,[6] and a rate discrepancy cannot be proved by a comparison alone of equal length of hauls from different producing points into different territories, since groupings are permitted to the carriers and no satisfactory comparison can be made without them.[7] Thus, communities may be united into common rate points.[8] Requirements for dis-excluded from a charge for the extra cleaning and disinfecting required — State Public Utilities Commission v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 116 N. E. 696, 279 Ill. 194.

Equalization order improper

A railroad commission circular, equalizing intra-state carload rates on sugar and molasses shipments, was not a proper exercise of the group-making power, where limited to a single territorial location.—Houston Chamber of Commerce v. Railroad Commission of Texas, Civ. App., 19 S.W.2d 583, affirmed Rail-

tance tariff rates do not apply to rates for switching operations or to movements from place to place within a single shipping point, but for such operations a rate may be required and charged different from those made applicable to line hauls.[9] In the determination of the limits of a shipping point so as to determine the reasonableness of the rates applicable or their applicability thereto, the important question is whether the district is a single industrial center, and, in determining whether a district is a single industrial center for the purpose of determining the limits of a shipping point, the extent of the district, the industrial relation of one part to another, the nature of the traffic, the manner of handling the traffic, whether it is handled by train crews or switching crews and whether on waybills or switching orders, and whether or not the carrier and the public have acquiesced in applying a switching tariff are all to be considered.[10] When considering the reasonableness of rates, courts and commissions may take into consideration commercial necessity, that is, the application of principles in fixing rates which are forced on common carriers by various conditions and circumstances and are in common practice among them—a business policy which influences the carriers themselves to disregard a rule of strict comparison in respect of distance of carriage.[11] Competition is a factor which may overcome mere distance.[12]

§ 292. Competition

Competition is one of the factors which is to be considered in determining the reasonableness of rates.

Competition with other carriers and other fields and in the market reached is an important factor and may be considered in determining the reasonableness of rates,[13] provided the competition is genuine and not a pretense[14] and possesses the attribute of producing a substantial and material effect on traffic and rate making.[15] Carriers must be allowed to meet competition or they must go out of business.[16] In initiating rates they may adjust them to competitive conditions and, within the zone of reasonableness, prescribe such rates as will obtain or retain desired traffic for their lines,[17] and, to augment their traffic, establish rates on particular commodities on an out of pocket plus basis, that is, rates which are sufficient to more than meet all actual and immediate costs of transportation, but are not necessarily sufficient to pay their full share of transportation expenses including all operating expenses and fixed charges, and, in addition thereto, interest on bonded indebtedness and reasonable return to capital invested in the carrier service.[18]

Distinction between commission made and carrier initiated rates

The rule in cases where some regulatory agency is attempting to

However, carriers have no right to recapture traffic which they originated by applying thereto unreasonable rates;[19] and, while the carriers may meet competition by equalizing rates or maintaining differentials both to interior points and to ports, they may not adjust their rates with the motive of injuring or aiding a shipper, a particular kind of traffic, or a locality.[20]

In deciding whether rates and charges, made at a low rate to secure foreign freights which would otherwise go by other competitive routes, are or are not undue and unjust, the fair interests of the carrier companies and the welfare of the community which is to receive and consume the commodities are to be considered.[21] Consideration must be given to the right of shippers to avail themselves of advantages which one form of transportation may have over another.[22] A carrier cannot be compelled to reduce a reasonable rate in order to enable shippers to meet competition, where the carrier is not responsible for the existing competitive conditions,[23] nor may a regulatory commission compel railroads to reduce their rates below a reasonable level in order to meet water or truck competition;[24] and the fact that a carrier has voluntarily depressed rates to a given point in order to meet competition does not compel it to lower a higher reasonable rate to other destinations.[25] The fact that the competition originated with the carriers whose rates are complained of will not prevent its consideration in determining whether the rates are unreasonable.[26]

Extent of consideration. A decision as to the reasonableness of rates cannot be based entirely on economic conditions;[27] the factor of competition is not the only matter to be considered, and, while it may be controlling, it is not necessarily so,[28] and will not be where other considerations render the rate reasonable or unreasonable as the case may be.[29]

impose maximum rates which a carrier claims are confiscatory is entirely different from that governing cases where the carrier is voluntarily offering the rates. Where a rate is imposed by a regulatory body it may not be based alone on the out-of-pocket costs ascribed to that particular traffic, but to be lawful the rate must be sufficient to cover a ratable proportion of the average cost of traffic generally, including a return on the property devoted to public service. To hold otherwise would compel the performance of a certain specified kind of service by the carrier at less than average cost. The extension of this principle to other classes of traffic, if pursued far enough, would bankrupt the road. Where, however, carriers voluntarily propose to reduce certain rates to an out-of-pocket plus basis in order to augment the total traffic carried, a wholly different situation is presented. The menace of confiscation is absent, for volenti non fit injuria; and the additional traffic, if secured with a resulting augmentation of net revenue instead of laying a burden upon other traffic, affords the possibility of lightening the burden thereon by bringing a greater tonnage under contribution to net revenue. The criteria of a reasonably compensatory rate in a confiscation case are therefore essentially distinct from the criteria of a reasonably compensatory rate where carriers volunteer a reduction on certain rates to an out-of-pocket plus basis.—Lang v. Railroad Commission of California, 42 P.2d 639, 2 Cal.2d 550.

Competition does not make unreasonable rate reasonable

Railroad freight rate which is unreasonable because it fails to give carrier adequate return, because it unreasonably threatens rate structure, or because it creates undue prejudice or preference as between individuals or localities, is still unreasonable and must be suspended although its raising or lowering may adversely affect competitive water transportation.—Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. U. S., D.C.Ohio, 7 F.Supp. 33, affirmed 55 S.Ct. 822, 295 U.S. 476, 79 L.Ed. 1553, rehearing denied 56 S.Ct. 81, 296 U.S. 661, 80 L.Ed. 471.

Competition does not make reasonable rate unreasonable

Rate for common commodity to common market cannot be reduced on line having longer haul to enable shipper having longer haul to compete with shippers on other lines who have a shorter haul without proving the longer haul rate excessive.—Cincinnati Northern R. Co. v. Public Utilities Commission of Ohio, 156 N.E. 506, 116 Ohio St. 397.

Competition between shippers. A regulatory commission has no authority to fix a rate for the sole purpose of enabling shippers to meet commercial competition but it is entitled to consider commercial competition in connection with other evidence in determining a proper rate.[30] The mere fact that a proposed rate will enable one or more shippers to benefit from a natural location is not sufficient to warrant its rejection, since the regulatory commission does not have the duty or the power to equalize profit and loss results of competing companies in different localities by overcoming geographical and commercial advantages with rate adjustments.[31]

§ 293. Character and Value of Goods Shipped

The character and value of the goods shipped and their weight, bulk, and convenience of handling are factors to be considered in determining the reasonableness of rates, but they are not conclusive thereon.

The rate for transportation and delivery is largely regulated by the character of the commodity, and as some classes of goods are more valuable and involve greater responsibility, and some are more difficult to handle and involve greater expense than others, the charge for carriage, handling, and delivering may be determined accordingly.[32] Their character,[33] value,[34] weight and bulk,[35] the convenience to the carrier in transporting them,[36] and the liability assumed[37] are factors to be considered in determining the reasonableness of rates charged; but they are in no sense conclusive,[38] and where a difference in value of a product transported from different sections does not justify it, it is proper not to consider it.[39] Thus, a lower rate properly may be applied to a product when in an unfinished condition than that applicable to it when finished.[40] Nevertheless, while there may be a good reason for a lower rate on bulky freight of a low class than that charged for carrying articles of a different sort, yet the mere grade of the commodity cannot be regarded as furnishing a sufficient ground for compelling the carrier to transport it for less than cost or without substantial reward.[41]

§ 294. Local or Through Freight

In determining the reasonableness of rates, whether the traffic is local or through traffic is to be considered; ordinarily the through rate should not exceed the aggregate of the intermediate rates.

Length of haul is an element of prime importance in determining the rates for transportation.[42] The question of whether the traffic is local or through traffic is to be considered in determining the reasonableness of a rate for transportation,[43] as the conditions which surround them are dissimilar;[44] and, since the cost of moving local freight is obviously greater than that of moving through freight,[45] a through rate may properly be lower than a local rate.[46] Apart from statutory enactment, it is prima facie unreasonable to charge more

Higher local rate proper

Where the local traffic consists mostly of merchandise, and is light in volume, short in haul, and small for a through haul than the aggregate of the intermediate rates,[47] and, in a number of jurisdictions, carriers are prohibited by statute from charging any greater compensation as a through rate than the aggregate of the intermediate rates, except that it is generally provided that, after proper application by the carrier and due investigation by the regulatory board or commission, the carrier in a proper case may be authorized to charge more for the through rate than the aggregate of the intermediates.[48] A through freight rate is not necessarily reasonable because it does not exceed the aggregate of two reasonable local rates.[49]

The testimony of experts as to the relative cost of doing local and through business is not to be disregarded simply because it cannot demonstrate by figures the exact amount of percentage of the extra cost, as it is almost, if not quite, impossible to determine the difference with mathematical certainty.[50]

§ 295. Charging More for Short than for Long Haul

In general it is unreasonable to charge more for a shorter than a longer haul where the conditions are similar, and this rule is embodied in statutes in many jurisdictions, provision ordinarily being made for allowing exceptions thereto in proper cases after proper investigation by a regulatory commission or board.

Apart from statutory enactment, it is prima facie unreasonable to charge more for a shorter than for a longer haul,[51] and in some states statutory or constitutional provisions or orders of regulatory commissions prohibit carriers from charging more for a short than a long haul over the same line or route, in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance,[52] or from charging, for any distance within the state, a larger sum than is charged for an equal or greater distance over the same road and connecting lines of road.[53] Such statutes or constitutional provisions, however, usually provide that, on application by a carrier to a regulatory board or commission, such board or commission, after investigation, may authorize the carrier to charge more for a short than a long haul, where the facts warrant it,[54] as, for example, in in individual shipments, thereby adding materially to the costs of transportation, rates above the average of those for the entire business of the carrier are justified.—Northern Pac. R. Co v. Keyes, C.C.N.D., 91 F. 47.

Since the amendment of Interstate Commerce Act § 4, by Act June 18, 1910, Comp.St. § 8566, a carrier no longer has the right as it did prior thereto to determine in the first instance whether a dissimilarity in conditions justifies the charge of a greater rate for a shorter haul than for a longer haul over the same route, but any such charge is prohibited, unless the commission has previously made an order consenting to the higher rate to the intermediate point.—Davis v. Parrington, C.C.A. Minn., Or., 281 F. 10, certiorari granted, 43 S.Ct. 95, 260 U.S. 717, 67 L.Ed. 479, and reversed on other grounds 44 S.Ct. 380, 264 U.S. 403, 68 L.Ed. 762.

Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 175 P. 682, 179 Cal. 140, 13 A.L.R. 274.

Authorization not shown

Under state constitution authorizing state regulatory commission to order to meet competition;[55] but the plight of the industry involved in the transportation service is not alone sufficient.[56] Such statutes and constitutional provisions are valid[57] and rates in violation thereof are unlawful and may be abrogated without any finding by the regulatory commission that they are unreasonable.[58] They have reference to shipments made over a direct and ordinary route[59] and where the longer shipment is made over the regular and ordinary route the fact that it could have been made over a shorter route does not prevent it from constituting a violation;[60] nor does the fact that deliveries are made on spurs or sidetracks from the main line of track take a shipment out of the application of the rule.[61] Such a statute is violated by the publication of the lower rate for the longer haul without permission, and the fact that property has not been moved over the longer distance at the lower published rate is immaterial.[62] Where the statute limits the prohibition against charging more for a short than for a long haul to a point where the haul is over the same line or route, in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance, it does not apply where the destination of the shipment is on another line and is not an intermediate point on the direct or ordinary route,[63] or where the two hauls are in different directions and made under substantially different circumstances and conditions.[64]

Where a statute fixes a maximum rate for a des-authorize a deviation from the constitutional provision prohibiting a carrier from charging more for a short than a long haul over the same line or route in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance, only upon application of the carrier and after an investigation by the commission, and not authorizing it to fix temporary rates pending investigation, orders of the commission permitting railroads to file schedules with applications for desired changes in rates, and to continue rates then in force pending investigation, do not legalize rates subsequently charged in violation of the constitutional prohibition against charging more for a short than a long haul, it not appearing that the commission ever investigated or approved such charges.—Southern Pac Co. v. California Adjustment Co, Cal., 237 F. 954, 150 C. C A. 604, certiorari dismissed 39 S Ct. 132, 248 U.S. 595, 63 L.Ed. 438, and affirming, D C, California Adjustment Co. v. Southern Pac. Since Interstate Commerce Act § 4, Comp St § 8566, which originally prohibited a greater rate under substantially similar circumstances for a shorter than for a longer haul over the same line, was amended by Act June 18, 1910, which added the words "or route" after the word "line," the long and short haul clause is no longer limited to transportation over the line of a single carrier, but includes transportation under a joint rate by connecting carriers.—Davis v. Statute held to repeal prior act

Statute which prohibited greater charge for short haul than for longer haul in any direction on and over

ignated distance, a rate in excess of that so designated for a shorter haul has been held unreasonable as a matter of law.[65]

A statute requiring a carrier to carry freights over longer lines for the same rates as required by any railroad company for hauling the same freight between the same points by a shorter line, no matter how great the disparity in the length of such hauls may be, is unconstitutional, where such statute is an absolute finality, without the right of judicial investigation by due process of law.[66]

The fact that a carrier charges a higher rate to an intermediate point than to a more distant point does not prove the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the higher rate, for the question of reasonableness is always a question of fact, depending upon the proof in each case.[67]

§ 296. Confiscatory Rates

Rates which are confiscatory are unreasonable, but the mere fact that rates are not confiscatory does not make them reasonable.

To require carriers to perform services for less than cost amounts to confiscation and is unlawful.[68] To constitute a rate confiscatory it is not essential that there should be a total deprivation of reward for the use of the carrier's property or a taking of the corpus of the property; if the law renders it impossible to obtain from the use of the property a reasonable and fair return it is confiscatory in its operation and effect.[69] An order by the regulatory commission fixing a rate which necessitates the carrier using the earnings from property employed other than in the transportation service to meet deficits from its carrier operations is confiscatory.[70] To render rates unreasonable, it is not essential that they should amount to practical confiscation,[71] and rates are not necessarily reasonable when they allow any dividend, however small.[72] The mere fact that a rate is nonconfiscatory does not indicate that it must be deemed to be just and reasonable.[73] Rates which are substantially higher than rates which are merely nonconfiscatory may be deemed to be just and reasonable.[74]
